That the joint high commissioners who negotiated the treaty so understood and intended the phrase is certain, for in a statement containing an account of their negotiations, prepared under their supervision and approved by them, we find the following entry on the subject: "The transit question was discussed, and it was agreed that any settlement that might be made should include a reciprocal arrangement in that respect for the period for which the fishery articles should be in force."

In addition to this very satisfactory evidence supporting this construction of the language of Article XXIX, it will be found that the law passed by Congress to carry the treaty into effect furnishes conclusive proof of the correctness of such construction.

This law was passed March 1, 1873, and is entitled "An act to carry into effect the provisions of the treaty between the United States and Great Britain, signed in the city of Washington the 8th day of May, 1871, relating to the fisheries." After providing, in its first and second sections, for putting in operation Articles XVIII to XXV, inclusive, and Article XXX of the treaty, the third section is devoted to Article XXIX, as follows: "SEC. 3. That from the date of the President's proclamation authorized by the first section of this act, and so long as the Articles XVIII to XXV, inclusive, and Article XXX of said treaty shall remain in force according to the terms and conditions of Article XXXIII of said treaty, all goods, wares, and merchandise arriving," etc., following in the remainder of the section the precise words of the stipulation on the part of the United States as contained in Article XXIX, which I have already fully quoted.

Here, then, is a distinct enactment of the Congress limiting the duration of this article of the treaty to the time that Articles XVIII to XXV, inclusive, and Article XXX should continue in force. That in fixing such limitation it but gave the meaning of the treaty itself, is indicated by the fact that its purpose is declared to be to carry into effect the provisions of the treaty, and by the further fact that this law appears to have been submitted before the promulgation of the treaty, to certain members of the Joint High Commission, representing both countries, and met with no objection or dissent.

There appearing to be no conflict or inconsistency between the treaty and the act of the Congress last cited, it is not necessary to invoke the well settled principle that in case of such conflict the statute governs the question.

In any event, and whether the law of 1873 construes the treaty or governs it, section 29 of such treaty, I have no doubt, terminated with the proceedings taken by our Government to terminate Articles XVIII to XXV, inclusive, and Article XXX of the treaty. These proceedings had their inception in a joint resolution of Congress passed May 3, 1883, declaring that in the judgment of Congress these articles ought to be terminated, and directing the President to give the notice to the Government of Great Britain provided for in Article XXXIII of the treaty. Such notice having been given two years prior to the 1st day of July, 1885, the articles mentioned were absolutely terminated on the last named day, and with them Article XXIX was also terminated.

If by any language used in the joint resolution it was intended to relieve section 3 of the act of 1873 embodying Article XXIX of the treaty from its own limitations, or to save the article itself, I am entirely satisfied that the intention miscarried.

But statutes granting to the people of Canada the valuable privileges of transit for their goods from our ports and over our soil, which had been passed prior to the making of the treaty of 1871 and independently of it, remained in force; and ever since the abrogation of the treaty, and notwithstanding the refusal of Canada to permit our fishermen to send their fish to their home market through her territory in bond, the people of that Dominion have enjoyed without diminution the advantages of our liberal and generous laws.

Without basing our complaint upon a violation of treaty obligations, it is nevertheless true that such refusal of transit and the other injurious acts which have been recited constitute a provoking insistance upon rights neither mitigated by the amenities of national intercourse nor modified by the recognition of our liberality and generous considerations. The history of events connected with this subject makes it manifest that the Canadian Government can if so disposed administer its laws and protect the interests of its people without manifestation of unfriendliness and without the unneighborly treatment of our fishing vessels of which we have justly complained; and whatever is done on our part should be done in the hope that the disposition of the Canadian Government may remove the occasion of a resort to the additional executive power now sought through legislative action.

I am satisfied that upon the principles which should govern retaliation our intercourse and relations with the Dominion of Canada furnish no better opportunity for its application than is suggested by the conditions herein presented; and that it could not be more effectively inaugurated than under the power of suspension recommended.

While I have expressed my clear conviction upon the question of the continuance of section 29 of the treaty of 1871, I, of course, fully concede the power and the duty of the Congress in contemplating legislative action to construe the terms of any treaty stipulation which might upon any possible consideration of good faith limit such action; and likewise the peculiar propriety in the case here presented of its interpretation of its own language as contained in the laws of 1873, putting in operation said treaty, and of 1883 directing the termination thereof; and if in the deliberate judgment of Congress any restraint to the proposed legislation exists it is to be hoped that the expediency of its early removal will be recognized.

I desire also to call the attention of the Congress to another subject involving such wrongs and unfair treatment to our citizens as, in my opinion, require prompt action.

The navigation of the Great Lakes, and the immense business and carrying trade growing out of the same, have been treated broadly and liberally by the United States Government, and made free to all mankind, while Canadian railroads and navigation companies share in our country's transportation upon terms as favorable as are accorded to our citizens.

The canals and other public works built and maintained by the Government along the line of the Lakes are made free to all.

In contrast to this condition, and evincing a narrow and ungenerous commercial spirit, every lock and canal which is a public work of the Dominion of Canada is subject to tolls and charges.

By Article XXVII of the treaty of 1871 provision was made to secure to the citizens of the United States the use of the Welland, St. Lawrence, and other canals in the Dominion of Canada, on terms of equality with the inhabitants of the Dominion, and to also secure to the subjects of Great Britain the use of the St. Clair Flats Canal on terms of equality with the inhabitants of the United States.

The equality with the inhabitants of the Dominion which we were promised in the use of the canals of Canada did not secure to us freedom from tolls in their navigation, but we had a right to expect that we being Americans and interested in American commerce would be no more burdened in regard to the same than Canadians engaged in their own trade; and the whole spirit of the concession made was, or should have been, that merchandise and property transported to an American market through these canals should not be enhanced in its cost by tolls many times higher than such as were carried to an adjoining Canadian market. All our citizens, producers and consumers, as well as vessel owners, were to enjoy the equality promised.

And yet evidence has for some time been before the Congress, furnished by the Secretary of the Treasury, showing that while the tolls charged in the first instance are the same to all, such vessels and cargoes as are destined to certain Canadian ports are allowed a refund of nearly the entire tolls, while those bound for American ports are not allowed any such advantage.

To promise equality and then in practice make it conditional upon our vessels doing Canadian business instead of their own is to fulfill a promise with the shadow of performance.

I recommend that such legislative action be taken as will give Canadian vessels navigating our canals, and their cargoes, precisely the advantages granted to our vessels and cargoes upon Canadian canals, and that the same be measured by exactly the same rule of discrimination.

The course which I have outlined, and the recommendations made, relate to the honor and dignity of our country and the protection and preservation of the rights and interests of all our people. A government does but half its duty when it protects its citizens at home and permits them to be imposed upon and humiliated by the unfair and overreaching disposition of other nations. If we invite our people to rely upon arrangements made for their benefit abroad, we should see to it that they are not deceived; and if we are generous and liberal to a neighboring country our people should reap the advantage of it by a return of liberality and generosity.

These are subjects which partisanship should not disturb or confuse. Let us survey the ground calmly and moderately, and having put aside other means of settlement, if we enter upon the policy of retaliation let us pursue it firmly, with a determination only to subserve the interests of our people and maintain the high standard and the becoming pride of American citizenship.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, August 23, 1888.

[The reading of the message was greeted with loud applause on the Democratic side.]

The SPEAKER. The message will be printed and referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. McCREARY. Before leaving this subject, Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Foreign Affairs be allowed to report upon the message at any time.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kentucky?

Mr. HITT. I would suggest to the gentleman from Kentucky, the acting chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, that there be a larger number than usual of this document printed for the use of the House.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. Yes, it is a good campaign document.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I would also suggest that there be printed with this message copies of the various treaties and laws therein referred to.

Mr. STRUBLE. That is very proper.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois suggests to the gentleman from Kentucky to modify his request for unanimous consent to report on the message at any time, by submitting at the same time a request that a larger number than usual of the documents be printed. What number would the gentleman suggest?

Mr. McCREARY. I am perfectly willing that there shall be printed a hundred thousand copies, if the gentleman wants it.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. Let us have a hundred thousand.

Mr. HITT. I think 5,000 copies ought to be printed at least.

The SPEAKER. The House on its own motion has no power to order the printing of any document in excess of $500. If the cost exceeds that sum a concurrent resolution will be necessary.

Mr. HITT. I would suggest that 5,000 copies be printed, which will probably not exceed the limit.

Mr. McCREARY. I think we ought to have more than that, and I would suggest at least 15,000 copies.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. Let us have $500 worth, anyway.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. BUCHANAN] asks unanimous consent to embody in the order for printing the treaties and statutes referred to in the message of the President, which of course would increase the cost.

Mr. BLAND. Let that be done in a separate resolution.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the proposition to print 15,000 copies of the message with the treaties and statutes referred to will be referred to the Committee on Printing, which committee can ascertain and report the cost.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. HITT. That would include only the one treaty and the statutes relating to that.

The SPEAKER. There are two treaties referred to in the message, that of 1818 and of 1871.

Mr. FARQUHAR. I hope the order will also include the act passed on March 3, 1887, which was the act retaliatory.

The SPEAKER. It includes that, because it is mentioned in the message.

Mr. FARQUHAR. What number of the document is proposed to be printed?

The SPEAKER. It is proposed to refer the matter to the Committee on Printing with a view to ordering 15,000 copies printed.

Mr. FARQUHAR. Very well; I think that is better.

Mr. GROSVENOR. The whole matter of printing had better go to the Committee on Printing. I am inclined to think that perhaps some of our friends will not be so anxious to have it printed when it goes there.

The SPEAKER. The order has been made to refer to the Committee on Printing the question of printing 15,000 copies of the message with the several treaties and statutes referred to in the message.

Mr. HITT. Including that referred to by the message as having been negotiated?

The SPEAKER. The order will include the printing of all statutes or treaties referred to in the message, and the Committee on Printing can report to the House the cost.

RIGHTS OF AMERICAN FISHERMEN.

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. 11257) to empower the President to carry out the purposes of an act to protect and defend the rights of American fishermen, approved March 3, 1887; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. KEAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to have that bill printed in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, that order will be made.

There was no objection.

The bill is as follows:

A bill (H. R. 11257) to empower the President more effectually to carry out the purposes of an act entitled "An act to authorize the President of the United States to protect and defend the rights of American fishing vessels, American fishermen, American trading and other vessels in certain cases, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1887, and to authorize the President to protect American interests against unjust discrimination in the use of canals in the British dominions of North America.

Be it enacted, etc., That whenever the President may deem it his duty to exercise any of the powers given to him by an act entitled "An act to authorize the President of the United States to protect and defend the rights of American fishing vessels, American fishermen, American trading and other vessels, in certain cases, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1887, it should be lawful for the President in his discretion, by proclamation to that effect, to suspend in whole or in part the transportation in bond and without the payment of duty of goods, wares, and merchandise imported or exported from any foreign country except Canada to or from the British dominions in North America across the territory of the United States.

SEC. 2. Whenever the President shall be satisfied that there is any discrimination whatever in the use of the Welland Canal, the St. Lawrence River canals, the Chambly Canal, or either of them, whether by tolls, drawbacks, refund of tolls, or otherwise, which is or may be detrimental to the interests of the United States or any of its citizens, it shall be lawful for the President in his discretion to issue a proclamation to that effect; whereupon there shall be collected a toll of 20 cents a ton upon every foreign vessel and her cargo passing through either the Sault Ste. Marie Canal or the St. Clair Flats Canal, and the Secretary of the Treasury may authorize and direct any of the customs officers to collect the tolls levied under this act. The President, when satisfied that such discrimination has ceased, may issue his proclamation to that effect in his discretion, whereupon the tolls authorized by this act shall no longer be collected.

SEC. 3. The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to make any regulations needful to carry this act into effect.

Mr. BURNES. Regular order.

DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Committee of the Whole resumed its session.

The CHAIRMAN. The tellers will resume their places, and the count will proceed on the appeal of the gentleman from South Carolina from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. BURNES. I would ask what the vote is at this time.

The CHAIRMAN. The tellers have reported—yeas 70, nays 63.

Mr. BURNES. I am satisfied, Mr. Chairman, that within the limit of the session we can not expect a quorum.

Mr. DIBBLE. There are ten minutes more. [After a pause.] I move that the committee rise.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Has the result been announced?

The CHAIRMAN. The tellers have reported—ayes 71, noes 63. The point of no quorum having been made, it is the duty of the Chair, under the rule, to report the fact to the House. If there be no objection, however, the Chair will omit the provision of the rule which requires that the roll shall be called.

Mr. DIBBLE. I ask unanimous consent that it be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the call of the roll will be dispensed with and the committee will rise.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. MCMILLIN having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. SPRINGER reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 10896) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1888, and for prior years, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. BURNES. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 55 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PRIVATE BILLS INTRODUCED AND REFERRED.

Under the rule private bills of the following titles were introduced and referred as indicated below:

By Mr. BELDEN: A bill (H. R. 11253) for the relief of Nathaniel Goff—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. BOOTHMAN: A bill (H. R. 11254) granting a pension to Elvira A. Hill—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 11255) granting a pension to Joshua Harper—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. HOVEY: A bill (H. R. 11256) for the relief of John D. Spencer—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as follows:

By Mr. COLLINS: Petition of W. G. Halpin for copies of his petition and evidence to support his claim against the Government of Great Britain for damages for unlawful imprisonment—to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. DUBOIS: Petition of the Grand Army of the Republic of Idaho, asking an appropriation of $200,000 for head-stones for deceased Union soldiers—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. LAIDLAW: Petition of citizens of Allegany and of Cattaraugus Counties, for amendment to the interstate-commerce law—to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. WILKINSON (by request): Petition for the relief of John W. Youman, of New Orleans, La.—to the Committee on Claims.

SENATE.

FRIDAY, August 24, 1888.

Prayer by Rev. A. W. PITZER, D. D., of the city of Washington.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

FISHING RIGHTS OF THE UNITED STATES.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was read:

To the Congress:

The rejection by the Senate of the treaty lately negotiated for the settlement and adjustment of the differences existing between the United States and Great Britain concerning the rights and privileges of American fishermen in the ports and waters of British North America, seems to justify a survey of the condition to which the pending question is thus remitted.

The treaty upon this subject concluded in 1818, through disagreements as to the meaning of its terms, has been a fruitful source of irritation and trouble. Our citizens engaged in fishing enterprises in waters adjacent to Canada have been subjected to numerous vexatious interferences and annoyances; their vessels have been seized upon pretexts which appeared to be entirely inadmissible, and they have been otherwise treated by the Canadian authorities and officials in a manner inexcusably harsh and oppressive.

This conduct has been justified by Great Britain and Canada, by the claim that the treaty of 1818 permitted it, and upon the ground that it was necessary to the proper protection of Canadian interests. We deny that treaty agreements justify these acts, and we further maintain that, aside from any treaty restraints, of disputed interpretation, the relative positions of the United States and Canada as near neighbors, the growth of our joint commerce, the development and prosperity of both countries, which amicable relations surely guaranty, and, above all, the liberality always extended by the United States to the people of Canada, furnish motives for kindness and consideration higher and better than treaty covenants.

While keenly sensitive to all that was exasperating in the condition, and by no means indisposed to support the just complaints of our injured citizens, I still deemed it my duty for the preservation of the important American interests, which were directly involved, and in view of all the details of the situation, to attempt by negotiation to remedy existing wrongs and to finally terminate by a fair and just treaty these ever-recurring causes of difficulty.

I fully believe that the treaty just rejected by the Senate was well suited to the exigency, and that its provisions were adequate for our security in the future from vexatious incidents and for the promotion of friendly neighborhood and intimacy, without sacrificing in the least our national pride or dignity.

I am quite conscious that neither my opinion of the value of the rejected treaty nor the motives which prompted its negotiation are of importance in the light of the judgment of the Senate thereupon. But it is of importance to note that this treaty has been rejected without any apparent disposition on the part of the Senate to alter or amend its provisions, and with the evident intention, not wanting expression, that no negotiation should at present be concluded touching the matter at issue.

The co-operation necessary for the adjustment of the long standing national differences with which we have to deal, by methods of conference and agreement, having thus been declined, I am by no means disposed to abandon the interests and the rights of our people in the premises or to neglect their grievances, and I therefore turn to the contemplation of a plan of retaliation as a mode, which still remains, of treating the situation.

I am not unmindful of the gravity of the responsibility assumed in adopting this line of conduct, nor do I fail in the least to appreciate its serious consequences. It will be impossible to injure our Canadian neighbors by retaliatory measures without inflicting some damage upon our own citizens. This results from our proximity, our community of interests, and the inevitable commingling of the business enterprises which have been developed by mutual activity.

Plainly stated, the policy of national retaliation manifestly embraces the infliction of the greatest harm upon those who have injured us, with the least possible damage to ourselves. There is also an evident propriety as well as an invitation to moral support, found in visiting upon the offending party the same measure or kind of treatment of which we complain, and as far as possible within the same lines. And above all things the plan of retaliation if entered upon should be thorough and vigorous.

These considerations lead me at this time to invoke the aid and counsel of the Congress and its support in such a further grant of power as seems to me necessary and desirable to render effective the policy I have indicated.

The Congress has already passed a law, which received Executive assent on the 3d day of March, 1887, providing that in case American fishing vessels being or visiting in the waters or at any of the ports of the British dominions of North America, should be or lately had been deprived of the rights to which they were entitled by treaty or law, or if they were denied certain other privileges therein specified, or vexed and harassed in the enjoyment of the same, the President might deny to vessels and their masters and crews of the British dominions of North America any entrance into the waters, ports, or harbors of the United States, and also deny entry into any port or place of the United States of any product of said dominions, or other goods coming from said dominions to the United States.

While I shall not hesitate upon proper occasion to enforce this act, it would seem to be unnecessary to suggest that if such enforcement is limited in such a manner as shall result in the least possible injury to our own people, the effect would probably be entirely inadequate to the accomplishment of the purpose desired.

I deem it my duty therefore to call the attention of the Congress to certain particulars in the action of the authorities of the Dominion of Canada, in addition to the general allegations already made, which appear to be in such marked contrast to the liberal and friendly disposition of our country as in my opinion to call for such legislation as will, upon the principles already stated, properly supplement the power to inaugurate retaliation already vested in the Executive.

Actuated by the generous and neighborly spirit which has characterized our legislation, our tariff laws have, since 1866, been so far waived in favor of Canada as to allow free of duty the transit across the territory of the United States, of property arriving at our ports and destined to Canada, or exported from Canada to other foreign countries.

When the treaty of Washington was negotiated in 1871, between the United States and Great Britain, having for its object very lagely the modification of the treaty of 1818, the privileges above referred to were made reciprocal and given in return by Canada to the United States, in the following language, contained in the twenty-ninth article of said treaty:

"It is agreed, that for the term of years mentioned in Article XXXIII of this treaty, goods, wares or merchandise arriving at the ports of New York, Boston, and Portland, and any other ports in the United States, which have been or may from time to time be specially designated by the President of the United States, and destined for Her Britannic Majesty's possessions in North America, may be entered at the proper custom-house and conveyed in transit, without the payment of duties, through the territory of the United States, under such rules, regulations, and conditions for the protection of the revenue, as the Government of the United States may from time to time prescribe; and under like rules, regulations, and conditions, goods, wares or merchandise may be conveyed in transit without the payment of duties from such possessions through the territory of the United States, for export from the said ports of the United States.

"It is further agreed that, for the like period, goods, wares, or merchandise arriving at any of the ports of Her Britannic Majesty's possessions in North America, and destined for the United States, may be entered at the proper custom-house and conveyed in transit, without the payment of duties, through the said possessions under such rules, and regulations, and conditions for the protection of the revenue as the government of the said possessions may from time to time prescribe; and under like rules, and regulations, and conditions goods, wares, or merchandise may be conveyed in transit, without payment of duties, from the United States through the said possessions to other places in the United States, or for export from ports in the said possessions."

In the year 1886 notice was received by the representatives of our Government that our fishermen would no longer be allowed to ship their fish in bond and free of duty through Canadian territory to this country, and ever since that time such shipment has been denied.

The privilege of such shipment which had been extended to our fishermen was a most important one, allowing them to spend the time upon the fishing grounds, which would otherwise be devoted to a voyage home with their catch, and doubling their opportunities for profitably prosecuting their vocation. In forbidding the transit of the catch of our fishermen over their territory in bond and free of duty the Canadian authorities deprived us of the only facility dependent upon their concession, and for which we could supply no substitute.

The value to the Dominion of Canada of the privilege of transit for their exports and imports across our territory and to and from our ports, though great in every aspect, will be better appreciated when it is remembered that for a considerable portion of each year the St. Lawrence River, which constitutes the direct avenue of foreign commerce leading to Canada, is closed by ice.

During the last six years the imports and exports of British Canadian provinces carried across our territory, under the privileges granted by our laws, amounted in value to about $270,000,000, nearly all of which were goods dutiable under our tariff laws, by far the larger part of this traffic consisting of exchanges of goods between Great Britain and her American provinces brought to and carried from our ports in their own vessels.

The treaty stipulation entered into by our Government was in harmony with laws which were then on our statute-book, and are still in force.

I recommend immediate legislative action conferring upon the Executive the power to suspend by proclamation the operation of all laws and regulations permitting the transit of goods, wares, and merchandise in bond across or over the territory of the United States to or from Canada.

There need be no hesitation in suspending these laws arising from the supposition that their continuation is secured by treaty obligations, for it seems quite plain that Article XXIX of the treaty of 1871, which was the only article incorporating such laws, terminated on the 1st day of July, 1885.

The article itself declares that its provisions shall be in force "for the term of years mentioned in Article XXXIII of this treaty." Turning to Article XXXIII we find no mention of the twenty-ninth article, but only a provision that Articles XVIII to XXV, inclusive, and Article XXX shall take effect as soon as the laws required to carry them into operation shall be passed by the legislative bodies of the different countries concerned, and that "they shall remain in force for the period of ten years from the date at which they may come into operation, and further until the expiration of two years after either of the high contracting parties shall have given notice to the other of its wish to terminate the same."

I am of the opinion that the "term of years mentioned in Article XXXIII," referred to in Article XXIX as the limit of its duration, means the period during which Articles XVIII to XXV, inclusive, and Article XXX, commonly called the "fishery articles," should continue in force under the language of said Article XXXIII.

That the joint high commissioners who negotiated the treaty so understood and intended the phrase is certain, for in a statement containing an account of their negotiations, prepared under their supervision and approved by them, we find the following entry on the subject: "The transit question was discussed, and it was agreed that any settlement that might be made should include a reciprocal arrangement in that respect for the period for which the fishery articles should be in force."

In addition to this very satisfactory evidence supporting this construction of the language of Article XXIX, it will be found that the law passed by Congress to carry the treaty into effect furnishes conclusive proof of the correctness of such construction.

This law was passed March 1, 1873, and is entitled "An act to carry into effect the provisions of the treaty between the United States and Great Britain, signed in the city of Washington the 8th day of May, 1871, relating to the fisheries." After providing, in its first and second sections, for putting in operation Articles XVIII to XXV, inclusive, and Article XXX of the treaty, the third section is devoted to Article XXIX, as follows: "SEC. 3. That from the date of the President's proclamation authorized by the first section of this act, and so long as the Articles XVIII to XXV, inclusive, and Article XXX of said treaty shall remain in force according to the terms and conditions of Article XXXIII of said treaty, all goods, wares, and merchandise arriving," etc., etc., following in the remainder of the section the precise words of the stipulation on the part of the United States as contained in Article XXIX, which I have already fully quoted.

Here, then, is a distinct enactment of the Congress limiting the duration of this article of the treaty to the time that Articles XVIII to XXV, inclusive, and Article XXX should continue in force. That in fixing such limitation it but gave the meaning of the treaty itself, is indicated by the fact that its purpose is declared to be to carry into effect the provisions of the treaty, and by the further fact that this law appears to have been submitted before the promulgation of the treaty, to certain members of the Joint High Commission, representing both countries, and met with no objection or dissent.

There appearing to be no conflict or inconsistency between the treaty and the act of the Congress last cited, it is not necessary to invoke the well-settled principle that in case of such conflict the statute governs the question.

In any event, and whether the law of 1873 construes the treaty or governs it, section 29 of such treaty, I have no doubt, terminated with the proceedings taken by our Government to terminate Articles XVIII to XXV, inclusive, and Article XXX of the treaty. These proceedings had their inception in a joint resolution of Congress passed May 3, 1883, declaring that in the judgment of Congress these articles ought to be terminated, and directing the President to give the notice to the Government of Great Britain provided for in Article XXXIII of the treaty. Such notice having been given two years prior to the 1st day of July, 1885, the articles mentioned were absolutely terminated on the last-named day, and with them Article XXIX was also terminated.

If by any language used in the joint resolution it was intended to relieve section 3 of the act of 1873 embodying Article XXIX of the treaty from its own limitations, or to save the article itself, I am entirely satisfied that the intention miscarried.

But statutes granting to the people of Canada the valuable privileges of transit for their goods from our ports and over our soil, which had been passed prior to the making of the treaty of 1871 and independently of it, remained in force; and ever since the abrogation of the treaty, and notwithstanding the refusal of Canada to permit our fishermen to send their fish to their home market through her territory in bond, the people of that Dominion have enjoyed without diminution the advantages of our liberal and generous laws.

Without basing our complaint upon a violation of treaty obligations, it is nevertheless true that such a refusal of transit and the other injurious acts which have been recited constitute a provoking insistance upon rights neither mitigated by the amenities of national intercourse nor modified by the recognition of our liberality and generous considerations. The history of events connected with this subject makes it manifest that the Canadian Government can if so disposed administer its laws and protect the interests of its people without manifestation of unfriendliness and without the unneighborly treatment of our fishing vessels of which we have justly complained; and whatever is done on our part should be done in the hope that the disposition of the Canadian Government may remove the occasion of a resort to the additional executive power now sought through legislative action.

I am satisfied that upon the principles which should govern retaliation our intercourse and relations with the Dominion of Canada furnish no better opportunity for its application than is suggested by the conditions herein presented; and that it could not be more effectively inaugurated than under the power of suspension recommended.

While I have expressed my clear conviction upon the question of the continuance of section 29 of the treaty of 1871, I, of course, fully concede the power and the duty of the Congress in contemplating legislative action to construe the terms of any treaty stipulation which might upon any possible consideration of good faith limit such action; and likewise the peculiar propriety in the case here presented of its interpretation of its own language as contained in the laws of 1873, putting in operation said treaty, and of 1883 directing the termination thereof; and if in the deliberate judgment of Congress any restaint to the proposed legislation exists it is to be hoped that the expediency of its early removal will be recognized.

I desire also to call the attention of the Congress to another subject involving such wrongs and unfair treatment to our citizens as, in my opinion, require prompt action.

The navigation of the Great Lakes, and the immense business and carrying trade growing out of the same, have been treated broadly and liberally by the United States Government, and made free to all mankind, while Canadian railroads and navigation companies share in our country's transportation upon terms as favorable as are accorded to our own citizens.

The canals and other public works built and maintained by the Government along the line of the Lakes are made free to all.

In contrast to this condition, and evincing a narrow and ungenerous commercial spirit, every lock and canal which is a public work of the Dominion of Canada is subject to tolls and charges.

By Article XXVII of the treaty of 1871 provision was made to secure to the citizens of the United States the use of the Welland, St. Lawrence, and other canals in the Dominion of Canada, on terms of equality with the inhabitants of the Dominion, and to also secure to the subjects of Great Britain the use of the St. Clair Flats Canal on terms of equality with the inhabitants of the United States.

The equality with the inhabitants of the Dominion which we were promised in the use of the canals of Canada did not secure to us freedom from tolls in their navigation, but we had a right to expect that we being Americans and interested in American commerce would be no more burdened in regard to the same than Canadians engaged in their own trade; and the whole spirit of the concession made was, or should have been, that merchandise and property transported to an American market through these canals should not be enhanced in its cost by tolls many times higher than such as were carried to an adjoining Canadian market. All our citizens, producers and consumers, as well as vessel owners, were to enjoy the equality promised.

And yet evidence has for some time been before the Congress, furnished by the Secretary of the Treasury, showing that while the tolls charged in the first instance are the same to all, such vessels and cargoes as are destined to certain Canadian ports are allowed a refund of nearly the entire tolls, while those bound for American ports are not allowed any such advantage.

To promise equality and then in practice make it conditional upon our vessels doing Canadian business instead of their own is to fulfill a promise with the shadow of performance.

I recommend that such legislative action be taken as will give Canadian vessels navigating our canals, and their cargoes, precisely the advantages granted to our vessels and cargoes upon Canadian canals, and that the same be measured by exactly the same rule of discrimination.

The course which I have outlined, and the recommendations made, relate to the honor and dignity of our country and the protection and preservation of the rights and interests of all our people. A government does but half its duty when it protects its citizens at home and permits them to be imposed upon and humiliated by the unfair and overreaching disposition of other nations. If we invite our people to rely upon arrangements made for their benefit abroad, we should see to it that they are not deceived; and if we are generous and liberal to a neighboring country our people should reap the advantage of it by a return of liberality and generosity.

These are subjects which partisanship should not disturb or confuse. Let us survey the ground calmly and moderately, and having put aside other means of settlement, if we enter upon the policy of retaliation let us pursue it firmly, with a determination only to subserve the interests of our people and maintain the high standard and the becoming pride of American citizenship.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, August 23, 1888.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move that the message of the President be printed and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio moves that the message of the President of the United States be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations and printed.

Mr. EDMUNDS. On that motion I should like to say a few words, although I am in favor of the motion.

If I were five or six years younger than I am I should be surprised at this message, but I am not. I am, for one, very highly gratified at the patriotic expressions, the hopes, wishes, almost intentions of the President of the United States in regard to the protection of American interests and American rights.

But the peculiarity of the situation, as it seems to me, is that having had a statute providing for self-defense, approved by the present President of the United States and passed by the substantially unanimous vote of both Houses (if that made any difference to his duty in faithfully executing the laws), and after full consideration of all its points and bearings, of the extent to which it should go and the objects to which it should be limited, and the circumstances under which it should be brought into play, a period of eighteen months, in round numbers, has gone by, and we are now informed by the President of the United States—for I take it that is what it means, although there is no word of that kind in the message—that no step of any kind has been taken to carry into execution the plain provisions of that law.

It is true the law did not require the President to put it into effect in the way of self-defense (as I prefer to call it rather than retaliation) until a case should have arisen of the wrong and injustice mentioned in the statute, which should satisfy the President of the United States that American rights and interests were being unjustly dealt with.

Now, what has happened since the passage of the act? If nothing has happened, if there have been no instances of unjust denial of American rights, of unjust treatment of American citizens in the provinces of the Dominion, then of course the President has been entirely right in taking no step in respect of the matter. If in his opinion, however, as he now states it, there have been instances of the denial of just rights to American citizens engaged in the business described in the act of 1887, why is it that he has not taken any step in the exercise of the power that the law imposed upon him, and in the exercise of his duty that the Constitution imposes upon him of taking care that the laws are faithfully executed?

Here was a law that he was to execute when the contingency should arise of the existence of a particular fact. He being satisfied that the fact existed, then it was his duty to take steps to obtain redress in the method that the statute pointed out.

So, then, we have the case of a period of nearly eighteen months during which, as he now states to us in this message, in some respects, not all (because the message refers to matters in some parts that the act of 1887 does not refer to in regard to a casus for action in some respects), the very rights that were defined in the statute of 1887, the very injuries that were pointed out for his observation and for his action when he should observe that they had occurred, have existed ever since the passage of that act; for in one instance he tells us that as early as 1886 an American fishing vessel, catching fish on the high seas outside of the 10 and the 20 mile delimitation that a treaty which is said to have been before the Senate provided for, and sailing as a purely commercial enterprise to a port of British North America for the purpose, as a commercial matter, of sending her cargo of fish by rail to Boston, has been by a general order, a sweeping order, denied that privilege and excluded.

The President says, and says justly, that that was a great, a most important, a grievous injury to American interests and to American rights. Why has he been silent for eighteen months, with the whole power of the law in his hands and the easy means of exerting all the functions that the law imputed to him in such a case to try it? Why has he remained inactive? Doubtless under the patriotic advice of the gentlemen who compose his Cabinet, or the heads of Department, and doubtless with the most patriotic motives, that it would be well to submit to what is now declared to be a gross and grievous wrong, with the means at hand to redress it or defend against it, and to enter into a discussion with the wrong-doer to provide for a new arrangement on a broader basis of British territoriality and a new arrangement on a broader basis of British free trade.

So I must suppose that these important and urgent powers that Congress unanimously put into his hands to be exercised as a duty in case he found the fact to exist that was described in the statute have been suspended by executive authority, by prerogative, as I think it is mentioned in some of the minority reports of some of the committees here, as if one of the attributes of the President has been suspended by prerogative, as an English King in some old time would undertake to suspend an act of Parliament—not to carry it into execution as long as you could talk with the nation that was continuing, while it was talking peace, the very wrong that is now so fully and well set forth in this message.

I must confess, Mr. President, my astonishment at such a course of action on the part of the Executive of the United States. I must express my surprise and my regret, and, using his language, not the regret of a partisan, but the regret of a citizen, that here for more than a year, with the means in his hands to redress it, he has failed to take any step, and now sends to us a message asking that additional powers, bearing as he supposes upon a broader field of retaliation and covering other topics, be given to him, and, as I must suppose, on the principle that he has already acted upon, that until they are given to him he will do nothing at all.

This business is very odd. I wish to call attention to one incident of this message which also struck me with a good deal of surprise, for referring to this treaty, which he says has been disposed of, we apparently do not now know what was the course of the negotiations that led to the treaty; we apparently do not now know what substipulations, and engagements, and understandings, and protocols, and glosses, and declarations existed. The President sent us the treaty with, I believe, one protocol, which was simply a formal one. He sent us another letter, I believe, in which our commissioners, or whatever they were called, our plenipotentiaries, declined to go into the customs duties question; and then on a resolution of the Senate, passed as every Senate from the beginning has passed such resolutions, asking for all the papers, the minutes, the protocols, the information, so that the Senate could see it in the light that our supposed representatives and the President had seen it, to understand how far it went and what it meant, what was proposed and what was denied, we were told that we had received all the information that it was thought proper to communicate, because there was an understanding that the discussions and propositions should be confidential. We know how that understanding came out in another country than our own. It was not confidential as to them, so far as now appears.

But here I find in this message a thing to which I wish to call the especial attention of the Senate. In his discussion as to whether the twenty-ninth article of the treaty of 1871 is in force or not, and as supporting the opinion that it is not (as gravely erroneous as in my judgment that opinion is, and as has been so often agreed in this body in former discussions of topics that touch this question, and as was agreed when we passed the act directing the President to terminate the other articles named), I find this statement:

> That the joint high commissioners who negotiated the treaty so understood and intended the phrase is certain, for in a statement containing an account of their negotiations, prepared under their supervision and approved by them, we find the following entry on the subject: "The transit question was discussed, and it was agreed that any settlement that might be made should include a reciprocal arrangement in that respect for the period for which the fishery articles should be in force."

What bearing that has upon the question as to whether the twenty-ninth article is in force it is impossible for me to see. As we can sometimes learn from Canada, the question as to whether this article continued in force after the notice of termination, which took effect in 1885, we readily ascertain from the Canadian discussions of it, from the Canadian pretension in respect of the shipping of our fish from their ports by railroad to our own; for so far as I yet know, and I think so far as anybody knows, the Canadian Government have not refused to transship fish upon the ground that that article was not in force. They have made no such pretension. They have refused to transship fish on the ground that that article did not override the convention of 1818, by which an American fishing vessel was not to come within 3 miles of the land for any purposes whatever except the four specially named. That was their point.

So, without at this time going into any broad consideration as to whether the twenty-ninth article is in force or not, I have only to say that it is of no consequence to the purpose we now have in hand whether it is in force or is not in force, and whether the act of 1866 is in force or is not in force.

In order to have anybody who shall read these discussions understand precisely what the powers of the President are in this connection, I ask the Secretary to read the fisheries act of 1887—the whole of it, from beginning to end.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

CHAP. 339.—An act to authorize the President of the United States to protect and defend the rights of American fishing vessels, American fishermen, American trading and other vessels, in certain cases, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, etc., That whenever the President of the United States shall be satisfied that American fishing vessels or American fishermen, visiting or being in the waters or at any ports or places of the British dominions of North America, are or then lately have been denied or abridged in the enjoyment of any rights secured to them by treaty or law, or are or then lately have been unjustly vexed or harassed in the enjoyment of such rights, or subjected to unreasonable restrictions, regulations, or requirements in respect of such rights; or otherwise unjustly vexed or harassed in said waters, ports, or places; or whenever the President of the United States shall be satisfied that any such fishing vessels or fishermen, having a permit under the laws of the United States to touch and trade at any port or ports, place or places, in the British dominions of North America, are or then lately have been denied the privilege of entering such port or ports, place or places in the same manner and under the same regulations as may exist therein applicable to trading vessels of the most favored nation, or shall be unjustly vexed or harassed in respect thereof, or otherwise be unjustly vexed or harassed therein, or shall be prevented from purchasing such supplies as may there be lawfully sold to trading vessels of the most favored nation; or whenever the President of the United States shall be satisfied that any other vessels of the United States, their masters or crews, so arriving at or being in such British waters or ports or places of the British dominions of North America, are or then lately have been denied any of the privileges therein accorded to the vessels, their masters or crews, of the most favored nation, or unjustly vexed or harassed in respect of the same, or unjustly vexed or harassed therein by the authorities thereof, then, and in either or all of such cases, it shall be lawful, and it shall be the duty of the President of the United States, in his discretion, by proclamation to that effect, to deny vessels, their masters and crews, of the British dominions of North America, any entrance into the waters, ports, or places of, or within the United States (with such exceptions in regard to vessels in distress, stress of weather, or needing supplies as to the President shall seem proper), whether such vessels shall have come directly from said dominions on such destined voyage or by way of some port or place in such destined voyage elsewhere; and also to deny entry into any port or place of the United States of fresh fish or salt fish or any other product of said dominions, or other goods coming from said dominions to the United States, the President may, in his discretion, apply such proclamation to any part or to all of the foregoing-named subjects, and may revoke, qualify, limit, and renew such proclamation from time to time as he may deem necessary to the full and just execution of the purposes of this act. Every violation of any such proclamation, or any part thereof, is hereby declared illegal, and all vessels and goods so coming or being within the waters, ports, or places of the United States contrary to such proclamation shall be forfeited to the United States; and such forfeiture shall be enforced and proceeded upon in the same manner and with the same effect as in the case of vessels or goods whose importation or coming to or being in the waters or ports of the United States contrary to law may now be enforced and proceeded upon. Every person who shall violate any of the provisions of this act, or such proclamation of the President made in pursuance hereof, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and, on conviction thereof, shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $1,000, or by imprisonment for a term not exceeding two years, or by both said punishments, in the discretion of the court.

Approved March 3, 1887.

Mr. EDMUNDS. In the same connection, as a kind of glossary or protocol to that statute, I ask the Secretary to read the report made by my friend from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN], my friend from Maine [Mr. FRYE], and myself as the managers of the conference on the part of the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses upon the bill which resulted in that law.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Mr. EDMUNDS, Mr. FRYE, and Mr. MORGAN, managers on the part of the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 3173) to authorize the President of the United States to protect and defend the rights of American fishing vessels, American fishermen, American trading and other vessels, in certain cases, and for other purposes, submitted the following report:

The managers on the part of the Senate of the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on their disagreeing on the amendments proposed by the House to the bill (S. 3173) respecting the fisheries, respectfully report that the bill passed the Senate on the 24th day of January, 1887, and on February 23 was returned from the House of Representatives with an amendment striking out the whole of the Senate bill and proposing one entire House amendment in its place.

On the 24th the bill was laid before the Senate, and the House amendment was disagreed to and a committee of conference asked and the papers ordered to be printed.

On the 25th instant the House agreed to the conference, and on the 26th the managers on the part of the House met the Senate managers in the afternoon of that day and the differences in the views of the two Houses fully discussed. The House conferees did not object to the substance of any part of the bill as it passed the Senate so far as it goes, but the first part of the first section of the House amendment undertakes to restate the enumeration of the cases and injuries mentioned in the Senate bill by entirely dropping the classifications or groups of vessels made in the Senate bill and to bring all vessels of the United States, of whatever character or class, within one definition.

The ground on which the Senate bill went in this respect was that United States fishing vessels purely had their rights regulated and measured by the treaty of 1818, as having the absolute right of fishing inshore in certain parts of the marine territories of the British dominions in North America and being prohibited from fishing in other parts, but still having the right to enter those other waters for the purposes enumerated in the treaty, and not to be abused with a view to fishing in prohibited waters.

The second classification of United States vessels made in the Senate bill covered precisely the same vessels, but having also a commercial character obtained by having not only a license to fish, but also under the laws of the United States a permit to touch and trade in foreign ports, and which, therefore, in their character as trading vessels, would not, as it was thought, be under the prohibitory provisions of the fishery treaty of 1818.

The third classification covered all other vessels of the United States not falling within the two preceding classes.

It was thought by the Senate, in passing the bill in that form, that a more clear understanding could be had of its application and enforcement than if all the vessels had been massed under one description. The Senate bill then proceeded to provide for cases not merely of the denial of treaty rights to purely fishing vessels, or the denial of lawful trading rights to fishing vessels otherwise to touch and trade or lawful rights to purely trading vessels, but to include also unjust vexation and harassment as well as exclusion from rights to trade accorded to the vessels of the most favored nation.

The House amendment applicable to the whole of this part of the subject purports to provide for the cases of vessels of the United States which "are denied in the ports or territorial waters of the British dominions in North America rights to which such vessels are entitled by treaty or by the law of nations or are denied the comity of treatment or the reasonable privileges usually accorded between neighboring and friendly nations."

It is, with great respect to the House of Representatives, thought by the Senate managers of the conference that this provision is not nearly so adequate to the condition of affairs as the provisions of the Senate bill which have been already described. There is no treaty in existence between the United States and Her Majesty's Government on the subject of the treatment of American vessels in British North American waters or ports, other than the provisions already referred to concerning purely fishing vessels and contained in the treaty of 1818, with possibly an exception as it respects one or two particular ports, and with the exception of such provisions as are contained in the treaty of 1871, which provisions in this last-named treaty are in these respects not applicable to the now existing difficulties. What positive rights "the law of nations" mentioned in the House amendment United States vessels entering British North American waters are entitled to the Senate managers think it would be somewhat difficult to define or explain. For, it is believed, by what is called the "law of nations" no vessel of the United States would have a right to enter British waters at all other than under an implied and tacit consent of the sovereign of that country, which could, at any moment, be positively withdrawn consistently with the understood sovereign rights of all nations. The Senate managers, therefore, think that this definition, measured by the law of nations, is really not much more than a definition measured by the will of the British Government so far as exclusion or the regulation of conduct in such waters might happen to go.

The next phrase in the House amendment proposed to take the place of the enumerations and descriptions mentioned in the Senate bill purports to provide for cases in which American vessels "are denied the comity of treatment or the reasonable privileges usually accorded between neighboring and friendly nations."

The Senate managers are of opinion that this phrase, so far as it applies to purely fishing vessels, may go beyond the treaty rights of such vessels as measured by the treaty of 1818. Whether the phrase was intended to include treatment and reasonable privileges secured between neighboring and friendly nations by treaty, such as exists in respect of British vessels of Her Majesty's dominions in Europe in waters of the United States and American vessels in European British waters, does not appear to be at all clear. If it be meant to cover such cases, then the provision would be entirely inapplicable to the case in hand. If it be meant to make the test that of the conduct of neighboring and friendly nations in the absence of a treaty concerning the respective rights of their vessels in the waters of the other, then the cases occurring in the last year of the treatment of American vessels in British waters of North America might be considered the standard to which this language would apply, for Great Britain is, in respect of her dominions of North America, a neighboring, and, in a public sense, a friendly nation. But if it were taken in general as applied to the general good neighborhood of nations, the standard would probably vary more or less, whatever country should be resorted to for finding the measurement of administration in regard to foreign vessels.

But, as has been before stated, the House managers, so far as we can understand, do not appear to find fault with the substance or the essential phraseology of the Senate bill.

The irreconcilable point of difference between the managers on the part of the two Houses is the insistance, on the part of the House managers, upon adding to the scope of the Senate bill, and so going beyond it, the further provision that, in case of injurious treatment to our vessels in British North American waters, it shall be within the competence of the President of the United States to absolutely stop intercourse not only by water, but by land, between the people of the United States and the people of the British territories adjacent, thus absolutely cutting off the continuous movement of railway trains from the British provinces to any part of the United States, and, in effect, reciprocally from the United States to British dominions, either on the northern border of Minnesota, at the river St. Mary, at Port Huron, at Detroit, at Grosse Isle, at Buffalo, at Niagara Falls, at Rouse's Point, at Highgate, Franklin, Richford, Troy, Derby, and Norton, on the northern border of Vermont, and on the northern and eastern borders of Maine; at all of which places it is understood there now exist interior railroad lines crossing the boundaries of the two countries—in some cases operated and practically owned by British subjects, and in other cases operated and practically owned by American citizens.

The Senate managers have felt it to be a duty to decline to go to this extent, and have thought it to be clear that the provisions for the protection of American interests set forth in the Senate bill, and in that part of the House amendment applicable to any British violation of the treaty of 1877, are entirely adequate to the peaceful end in view, and that there is no present justification for reposing in the Executive this further enormous power proposed by the House of Representatives in its amendment, and insisted upon by the House managers.

It seems clear to the Senate managers, and has not been controverted by the House managers, that the things the President is authorized to do by the Senate bill in the cases named are none of them in derogation, either directly or indirectly, of any treaty right, or of the peaceful business intercourse of nations, but that this Government in these respects is absolutely free to act in the manner proposed without being subject to the imputation that it is either in any way infringing the most liberal interpretation of any treaty or doing any act that nations at peace have not hitherto found themselves from time to time justified in doing, not in a spirit of belligerency, but merely as a matter of countervailing business regulations.

The Senate managers offered to the House managers to add to the Senate bill the provision contained in the House amendment providing that, if there should be any violation of Article XXIX of the treaty of 1871 on the part of Great Britain, the President should be authorized reciprocally to withdraw from British subjects the benefits of the same article with certain changes of phraseology, which, it is understood, were satisfactory to the House managers.

The Senate managers also expressed their willingness to accede to the third section of the House amendment, although the propriety of its form and substance is open to very considerable question.

The result of the conference, therefore, has been that the House of Representatives, through its managers, not objecting to the Senate bill, but desiring to add a new and enlarged provision to the Senate bill and to adopt measures additional to those mentioned in the Senate bill, and not necessarily dependent thereon, and the Senate managers unwilling to go to that extent, and so disagreeing to the House proposition, decline to make even the provision that has passed the Senate in respect of the subject of the protection of our fishing and other vessels, and to which the House makes no objection so far as it goes, unless the Senate will consent to make further legislative provisions which it believes to be unwise. It would seem needless to say that such a pretension, made by one of two co-ordinate legislative bodies, is quite untenable.

The essential principle upon which the two Houses have almost universally hitherto acted, and without which no legislation whatever could be accomplished when there was not perfect accord on all points, has been that when either House proposes legislation that is satisfactory to the other so far as it goes, and the other House desires to go further and make affirmative and additional law, if it can not convince its co-ordinate body that it is desirable to go further, the House proposing the affirmative additional legislation must recede. This principle is vitally important to the independence of each House, and so indispensable to the practical legislation of the country that the Senate managers have felt it to be a paramount duty to refuse to accede to this further House proposition, both as unnecessary and unwise, and as in derogation of the equal rights of the two bodies.

The Senate managers have felt it to be a duty in this important matter to report this state of things at once to the Senate for its information.

GEO. F. EDMUNDS.
WM. P. FRYE.
JNO. T. MORGAN.

Mr. EDMUNDS. So it will be seen that one of the very things that the President of the United States is now apparently for the first time solicitous upon was brought directly to the attention of the two Houses of Congress preceding the passage of this law, and that the Senate was of the opinion that the provisions contained in the law as it was proposed and as it finally passed were entirely adequate to the protection of American rights and interests in the respects in which they had been intruded upon and assailed. And we took into view, as Congress did when it passed the act providing for the annulment of the fisheries articles of the treaty of 1871, the fact that the twenty-ninth article of the treaty of 1871 was in force, both Houses did, and in order to legislate so that that would not stand in the way of redress we passed this statute (which the President in his message says a statute may do) to authorize him to deny Canadian vessels and Canadian goods access to our ports if they denied the right of our fishermen to transship fish; that the treaty had nothing to do with it; that if Great Britain, the treaty being in force, violated it on her side and denied to us a right that we had under it, we were no longer under any obligation to grant to her a right that she had under it, and it did not need a statute to do that. There are gentlemen within the hearing of my voice now who have occupied positions as Cabinet ministers of Presidents of the United States, there are others who have not who have been students of public law, and my friend from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] I can appeal to as one of the best of them, and they know that when one nation having a treaty with another chooses to break it or to refuse or refrain from carrying it into reciprocal and equal effect, the other nation is no longer bound, and it is at the option of her Executive, whose business it is to see that the laws are faithfully executed, and that nothing else is executed, shall stand up for the rights of the nation that is thus wronged, just as the Senator from New York [Mr. EVARTS] did under a treaty with some power of whom we are now speaking, who told them that if they chose to put a certain interpretation upon that treaty then he would regard it, under the direction of the President of the United States, as an end of the treaty.

Mr. VEST. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Certainly.

Mr. VEST. Do I understand the Senator from Vermont to assert that under the act of March 3, 1887, known as the retaliation act, the President had the power to retaliate as to the grievances of which he complains, and which are set forth in his message?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes.

Mr. VEST. That is the position of the Senator?

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is the position.

Mr. VEST. I understand him further to state that without any statute the general power exists in the President of the United States to retaliate whenever there has been an infraction of a treaty?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I have not said that. I will try to state my position again. I stated some time ago, I think, that the message of the President contains a reference to some topics of discontent that he has for the first time communicatod to Congress, although very old ones, and the attention of Congress was called to them in reports of committees long ago, touching the canals, for instance, that this act of 1887 does not touch at all, because the preamble, so to speak, the introduction of the act, the basis upon which the President is to exert his power, refers to the treatment of American vessels and not to the treatment of Americans who are in the Welland Canal. If the Canadian authorities treated the vessel there wrong that might do, perhaps; but to the ordinary land carriage it did not. It was really the fisheries question; but that being ascertained, the case of the denial by the Canadian authorities of the right of the Americans to transship their fish from Halifax to Boston when they brought them from the Grand Banks, and as a means of commerce, having, as the President of the United States says, the right to do that under the twenty-ninth article of the treaty of 1871, the President of the United States, first by force of this act of 1887, was justified and it was his duty to deny to Canadian fish, or any other Canadian goods, transportation across our country just so far and so fast as he should deem it an adequate redress for the wrong committed upon us; and then I added that if we had no such statute, our fishermen having a right to transship their fish from Halifax to Boston, where they have caught them on the high seas, and that being denied to them, under the twenty-ninth article of the treaty of 1871, it was within the competence and the duty of the President of the United States to inform the British Government that we regarded that article as no longer of force, for it could not be in force on one side and not on the other at the same time. That is what previous Presidents and Secretaries of State have done, to the honor and benefit of the American name and of American interests.

Now, sir, I want to read on the subject of this twenty-ninth article of the treaty of 1871 being in force a letter from the Secretary of State, addressed to Hon. Mr. REAGAN, a Senator of the United States, in connection with investigations of the Interstate Commerce Committee, and which was laid before that committee by the Senator from Texas in the course of his duty as a member of that committee, and it is now on the files of the committee, technically speaking, although, in fact, it is in my hands:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, January 7, 1887.

SIR: I had the honor to receive late yesterday afternoon your telegram asking to be informed "when was the treaty of Washington between the United States and the Dominion of Canada abrogated? When did its provisions cease to operate?"

The information you desire is found in the accompanying document, containing the correspondence which took place between this Department and the British minister in 1885, and the President's proclamation in regard to the termination of the fisheries articles of the treaty of Washington.

This document is reprinted in full in the recently printed Executive Document in relation to the rights of American fishermen in British North American waters (Executive Document No. 19, House of Representatives, Forty-ninth Congress, second session, pages 199-210), a copy of which is also inclosed herewith.

The treaty of Washington between the United States and Great Britain did not relate solely to the Canadian fisheries. Only the fishery articles thereof were abrogated, as enumerated in the President's proclamation of January 31, 1885. The remaining articles, comprising those which relate to commercial intercourse between the United States and the British North American possessions, are still in force.

I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,

T. F. BAYARD.

HON. JOHN H. REAGAN,
U. S. Senate.

Those enumerated articles did not, as the President says in his message, contain Article XXIX. They named the articles that were annulled by the force and in the method provided for in the treaty itself by the action of Congress, and when Congress came to pass the law which required the President of the United States to give notice of the termination of those articles, it named them, and then it provided for reinstating the laws of the United States which were then in a state of suspense as it respected those abrogated articles. With this careful phraseology, which, as I have said, was adopted because Congress perfectly understood, as every lawyer on investigation perfectly understood, as the Secretary of State, himself a great lawyer and statesman, understands, that Article XXIX is still in force, Congress provided for setting on foot again all the laws, etc., "so far as it relates to the articles of said treaty so to be terminated shall be and stand repealed and be of no force on and after the time of the expiration of said two years."

So much for that. We have got them, as we stand now in respect of the only fisheries wrong that the President mentions in this message of his as of crying and loud importance, as it is, the denial by the Canadian authorities, persisted in, as the President says, from 1886 until now, and now continued, of the right of American fishermen fishing on the high seas under that Article XXIX or under commercial reciprocity and kindness to transship their fish to Boston or New York, while a Canadian fisherman or any other British vessel coming to any one of our ports is by the force of that article and our friendly laws authorized to carry his fish to Canada or from Canada to New York for exportation without the payment of any duty, there is the fact; and the President tells us that it has existed now for two years.

Following that fact, which he says is a gross outrage and injury, is this statute of the United States, which says that when he is satisfied of that fact he shall apply the means of redress that the statute has put in his hands. Why does he not do it? I should be glad to have somebody say, I should be glad intellectually if the President of the United States has said in this message what the reasons are, what the impediments are to his endeavoring to faithfully execute the statute of the United States upon a state of circumstances that he officially reports to exist, when that statute makes it his duty to employ the means that the law has given to accomplish it. Oh, no. I believe in the time of the late war, if I may refer to that without offense, it was said from time to time that the more troops a certain Union general, or perhaps more than one general were supplied with, the greater difficulty they found in moving on the enemy, and were continually telegraphing to President Lincoln that they could not go until they had more force. Does the President of the United States really mean to say to Congress that he can not take any step provided for in the act of 1887 until Congress shall give him further powers, and particularly and chiefly the very powers that on full discussion eighteen months ago the Senate thought it was unfit to give him?

My friend from Alabama united with my friend from Maine and myself, and the Senate agreed with us, in saying that there was no necessity for reposing in the President such an enormous power as that, and that it ought not to be done certainly until it should have been found, by a faithful execution of the proposition that we did send to him and that he agreed to, that those means were inadequate, then we could consider what should be done next.

Alas, I think it is an infinite pity somewhere—perhaps it is the fault of this side of the Chamber or the other, or of somebody—it is an infinite pity that in so simple a case with adequate and full statutes, the force or weakness of which, if they have any weakness, has never yet been tested by the President, the law should remain unexecuted and in "a state of innocuous desuetude" until the President of the United States, these wrongs before his eyes as he says, could see whether Congress put any more ammunition into his hands before he fires.

Mr. HOAR and Mr. MORGAN addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. MORGAN. Does the Senator from Massachusetts desire to submit any remarks on this motion?

Mr. HOAR. I rose for that purpose.

Mr. MORGAN. Proceed then.

Mr. HOAR. I recognized the entire propriety when the Senator from Alabama rose at the same time that one on that side should be recognized, and if the Senator from Alabama desires, I will yield to him.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts first addressed the Chair.

Mr. MORGAN. Proceed; I do not desire to take the floor just now.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, confession is good for the soul, and it is a subject of considerable satisfaction to a benevolent mind to witness the working of the grand Democratic confessional which seems to have established itself in the White House. We got a message a short time ago, within three months, from the President of the United States which contained this language:

As the documents and papers referred to will supply full information of the positions taken under my administration by the representatives of the United States, as well as those occupied by the representatives of the Government of Great Britain, it is not considered necessary or expedient to repeat them in this message. But I believe the treaty will be found to contain a just, honorable, and, therefore, satisfactory solution of the difficulties which have clouded our relations with our neighbors on our northern border.

The whole subject-matter of our relations with our neighbors on our northern border so far as on the 20th day of February they seemed to require the removal of any cloud, were dealt with in a treaty which the President of the United States sent to us and which he and the head of the Department of State and every Democratic Senator who has dealt with the subject, so far as I now remember, loudly and vociferously declared removed every cause of offense or prevented its existence in the future which the American people had against the Dominion of Canada; and we were told when we pointed out grievance after grievance which was not touched, that we were proposing retaliation, that that was a most dangerous and abominable thing, never to be thought of or heard of, if it could be helped, among friendly nations, and that if we did not look out we should get the country into a war.

The Senators on that side of the Chamber having laid down before the demands and threats and pretentions of the little Dominion of Canada, they thought they were lying down by the side of the President to comfort him in his own position. Now, behold, poor man, the President undertakes to get up and shake the mud from his own coat and leaves them where they have placed themselves.

Why, sir, if this thing which is now set forth, and which has been affirmed by Republican Senators who have raised two committees of this body to address themselves to the charge that Canada has been all this time violating the treaty of 1871 in regard to our use of her canals and other transportation facilities, and in regard to the engagement made by Great Britain that she should afford us equal facilities to those afforded to her in our territory—if, I say, that is true, as we on this side of the Chamber have been affirming, how happens it that the Administration and the negotiators of this treaty have been dumb during the last two years on that subject?

If, when the representatives of Great Britain were in Washington, the Administration called their attention to this breach of faith on the part of Canada and Great Britain, to this wrong which the President now says demands the instant and prompt measure of retaliation, and they rejected a demand for redress, how happens it that that part of the negotiation was kept wholly secret from the Senate and from the people of the United States, how happens it that the President sent to us a treaty which it was claimed removed every cause of offense and complaint on the part of the American people so far as their relations with Canada were concerned? If, on the other hand, he did not call this to the attention of the representatives of Great Britain; if, on the other hand, our negotiators in negotiating a treaty of peace and amity were silent, then in what attitude does he now seek to place the people of the United States, or would they have been placed but for the intervention of the Senate in rejecting the proposed treaty? He would have had a long negotiation with Great Britain extending through months, he would have declared to her that the results of that negotiation were perfectly satisfactory to the country he represented, and then the moment the treaty to which she had consented had been ratified and accepted, he would have been prepared to turn around upon her with this hostile measure of retaliation.

Which of these two things is true? Has the President believed all the time he was urging upon us this treaty as a complete solution of this matter that it was not a complete solution, and that these grave causes of offense still exist to be prosecuted and pursued, and kept that belief the whole time from the representatives of the American people on the one side and the representatives of Great Britain on the other?

Now, the President of the United States comes in and asks of Congress additional power. These facts have been known to the Secretary of the Treasury for the past several years, and of course to the Administration, if we are to take the information conveyed to us in this message. On the 30th of January, 1888, the Senate passed a resolution asking the Secretary of the Treasury to communicate to Congress whether any communication had been had with the Dominion of Canada in reference to these grievances, and this is his reply under date of February 7, 1888:

In reply to the first inquiry, I have to state that no communication has been had with the Dominion of Canada, nor have any agreements been arrived at touching the transportation of goods since the abrogation of the articles of the treaty referred to.

Down to the 7th day of February, 1888, according to the communication of the Secretary of the Treasury, this Administration had been as dumb before Canada in regard to this ground of complaint as a sheep before the shearer. But in the next place the President claims—and I do not propose to add anything to what has been said by the honorable Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] on that subject, nor to express any opinion of my own in regard to it at the present time—the President claims that the twenty-ninth article of the treaty of 1871 has been abrogated, and that each nation therefore is at liberty without further negotiation, if it shall see fit, to proceed to regulate its own conduct in reference to this subject-matter of complaint without regard to any binding obligation of one toward the other. Very well; if that be true, then the Administration has all this time—and I desire to call the attention of the Senate to this proposition—had absolute power and control and discretion over the whole matter. The authority which the President asks, so far as it relates to the transporting of Canadian goods in bond over our railways or canals, or so far as stopping the employment of Canadian railroads and canals by our shippers of goods, is already complete. I ask the Secretary to read sections 3005 and 3006 of the Revised Statutes of the United States.

The Secretary read as follows:

SEC. 3005. All merchandise arriving at the ports of New York, Boston, Portland in Maine, or any other port specially designated by the Secretary of the Treasury, and destined for places in the adjacent British provinces, or arriving at the port of Point Isabel in Texas, or any other port specially designated by the Secretary of the Treasury, and destined for places in the Republic of Mexico, may be entered at the custom-house, and conveyed, in transit, through the territory of the United States, without the payment of duties, under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe.

SEC. 3006. Imported merchandise in bond, or duty paid, and products or manufactures of the United States may, with the consent of the proper authorities of the British provinces or Republic of Mexico, be transported from one port in the United States to another port therein, over the territory of such provinces or Republic, by such routes and under such rules, regulations, and conditions as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe; and the merchandise so transported shall, upon arrival in the United States from such provinces or Republic, be treated in regard to the liability to or exemption from duty or tax, as if the transportation had taken place entirely within the limits of the United States.

Mr. HOAR. My view of this matter is that the statute gives to the President of the United States or to the Secretary of the Treasury, who is under his authority and control, absolute power to do everything that he chooses in this matter, and to show that is the opinion of the Department itself and of the Administration, I desire to call the attention of the Senate to two circulars issued from the Treasury.

My proposition is that the transportation of merchandise coming from American railroads or canals or other modes of carriage through Canada is, by section 3006 of the Revised Statutes, to be conducted under such rules, regulations, and conditions as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe; and the moment the Administration was informed that this discrimination was made by Canada against our interests, the President had the right instantly to interpose and put an end to the entire traffic at once—just what he asks the special authority of Congress to do at the present time.

I desire to have read circular 102 and circular 116 of the year 1885.

The Secretary read as follows:

CIRCULAR.

TERMINATION OF CERTAIN ARTICLES OF THE TREATY OF WASHINGTON.

[1885. Department No. 102. Division of Special Agents.]

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, D. C., July 2, 1885.

To collectors of customs:

Notice having been given by the proclamation of the President, dated January 31, 1885, of the abrogation of Articles XVIII to XXV and Article XXX of the treaty of Washington, collectors of customs are hereby notified that article 844 of the Customs Regulations of 1884, which is identical with article 19 of the Regulations of March 30, 1875, made pursuant to Article XXX of said treaty, will cease to be in force from and after this date.

Shipments of merchandise in transit from one port or place within the territory of the United States to another by a route a part of which is by land carriage through the Dominion of Canada, and a part by the Great Lakes and the rivers connecting the same, or by the river St. Lawrence, in either British or American vessels, from ports on the northern frontier of the United States to ports on the Canadian frontier for transshipment to railway cars, and from points on the Canadian frontier, at the termini of railway transportation, to ports on the northern frontier of the United States, will hereafter be treated in all respects as ordinary importations from foreign contiguous territory.

DANIEL MANNING, Secretary.

Mr. HOAR. Now it will be seen that the Secretary of the Treasury, conceiving at the time that the twenty-ninth article of the treaty of 1871 was terminated, instantly exercised his authority under the statute of 1866, re-enacted by the Revised Statutes as section 3006, and declared that all merchandise coming from Canada as a part of the joint transportation routes should be subject to the ordinary customs duties, showing the opinion of the President and the Secretary who was the head of his Treasury Department that he possessed the ample power to accomplish this thing.

Now I ask the Secretary to read circular 116.

The Secretary read as follows:

CIRCULAR.

TRANSIT OF MERCHANDISE THROUGH THE DOMINION OF CANADA.

[1885. Department No. 116. Division of Special Agents.]

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, D. C., July 24, 1885.

To collectors and other officers of customs:

Under the authority contained in section 3006 of the Revised Statutes, imported merchandise, in bond or duty paid, and products and manufactures of the United States, may, with the consent of the proper authorities of the British provinces, be transported from one port in the United States to another port therein over the territory of such provinces, by such routes and under such rules, regulations, and conditions as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe.

Therefore, so much of Circular No. 102 of this Department, dated the 2d instant, as rescinded article 844 of the Customs Regulations of 1884 is revoked, and said article is hereby amended in such manner as to restrict the transportation therein referred to to American vessels. Customs officers will be governed accordingly.

The salaries of officers stationed in Canada to supervise transshipment from vessels to cars, and vice versa, must be reimbursed to the Government by the transportation companies interested.

DANIEL MANNING, Secretary.

Mr. HOAR. This is a repetition of the policy pursued in regard to the purchase of bonds. This Administration wanted to pile up a great surplus in the Treasury in order that it might be used as a lever or argument for an attack on our protective system, and accordingly they affected to have great doubts whether the act of Congress gave the Secretary of the Treasury power to expend that surplus in the purchase of the bonded debt of the United States, and after the mischief was all done and the surplus was distributed among the national banks of the country without interest, instead of being expended in the reduction of the accumulation in the Treasury, the President sent in to Congress a message saying that he thought he ought to have authority to expend the money in buying bonds; and on both Houses of Congress passing a resolution pointing out to him that he had the authority already, he said "On the whole I guess I have," and he proceeded to make his purchases.

Here is this Administration by two unmistakable, unquestionable acts affirming its authority to suspend this business as it sees fit or to impose upon it such terms, regulations, and conditions as the Secretary of the Treasury might see fit to impose, and yet with that power exercised on two important occasions—the exercise called out by our relations to Canada under the treaty of 1871—the President allows it to slumber during all these years when as he informs us these outrages on the part of Canada were going on, and even now refrains from its exercise and comes in and asks the Senate and House of Representatives to grant him a power which he knows perfectly well and believes already exists——

Mr. SPOONER. And he wants aid and counsel.

Mr. HOAR. And he wants the aid and counsel of Congress to enable him to exercise a power which he believes he has the right to exercise, and which his Secretary of the Treasury had twice already exercised during his administration.

I ask again, has the President of the United States called the attention of anybody to this wrong which it was fully in his power to have stopped and redressed at any moment? Did he call our attention to it in his annual message either of 1886 or 1887? Did he call our attention to it when, without a single suggestion that it was insufficient and did not reach this case, he signed the statute of 1887 passed by the two Houses of Congress? Did he call our attention to it when he sent in the treaty? How can he reconcile it with any national dignity or the national honor if the attention of the commissioners and envoys of Great Britain was not called to this when the treaty was negotiated, to have sent in a treaty declaring to us that it provided for every case of wrong which we were suffering from the Canadians on our northern border and being silent about this matter of informing us or the American people that a demand had been made on Great Britain which had been rejected, or if no such demand was made and his negotiators induced Great Britain to believe the treaty was full, satisfactory, and comprehensive of every cause of difference—how can he reconcile it either to our honor or our dignity if this treaty had been ratified to immediately after its ratification turn around to Great Britain and state, "Now that I have got this treaty signed I am going to declare non-intercouse with you on another ground, which I never mentioned during the entire negotiation?"

Now, see what he says in regard to our social and commercial intercourse in his message transmitting the treaty:

Our social and commercial intercourse with those populations who have been placed upon our borders and made forever our neighbors is made apparent by a list of United States common carriers, marine and inland, connecting their lines with Canada, which was returned by the Secretary of the Treasury to the Senate on the 7th day of February, 1888, in answer to a resolution of that body; and this is instructive as to the great volume of mutually profitable interchanges which has come into existence during the last half century.

This intercourse is still but partially developed, and if the amicable enterprise and wholesome rivalry between the two populations be not obstructed, the promise of the future is full of the fruits of an unbounded prosperity on both sides of the border.

The treaty now submitted to you has been framed in a spirit of liberal equity and reciprocal benefits, in the conviction that mutual advantage and convenience are the only permanent foundation of peace and friendship between States, and that with the adoption of the agreement now placed before the Senate a beneficial and satisfactory intercourse between the two countries will be established so as to secure perpetual peace and harmony.

Mr. President, if the patriotic and American spirit of a majority of this Senate had not scorned the surrender contained in the treaty just rejected, the American people would never have heard from the Executive a lisp of a desire to affirm and maintain and defend and establish their rights of equality and mutuality in relation to the system of transportation between this country and the Canadian provinces. The Senate has called the attention of the public and the Administration to it. It has demanded from time to time of the Secretary of the Treasury the information in his possession, and it has got a few brief, meager lines which are contained in the communications which have come in. It has raised two special committees in addition to the investigation of the Committee on Foreign Relations to collect the facts on this subject which this dilatory and halting Administration has failed to deal with. These facts were set forth in part in the spirited and able speech of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM], and they are set forth in part in the collections already made under the direction of the Committee on Foreign Relations; and it is idle for the President of the United States to undertake at this day to cover up his retreat, to cover up the surrender which would have been made but for the spirit and patriotism of the Senate, by undertaking to come to the front in regard to this matter.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President——

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator from Alabama allow me a word before he proceeds?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Alabama yield?

Mr. MORGAN. Certainly.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to add one sentence which I accidentally omitted when I was on the floor. I desired before I sat down to say that for myself, and no doubt for this side of the Chamber—I have no right to speak for them; of course I do not know the opinion of a large majority of the Senators—I should be in favor of giving to the President of the United States any authority in this matter which on examination shall be found in any respect to be needed. There is no difference of opinion on that subject.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, the message which came in yesterday afternoon and has been read this morning seems to have given a great shock to the Senators on the other side of this Chamber. The first effect of it was to cause the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] to interrupt the Senator from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] in his loved employment of speaking upon the political situation in the South, and to ask him to give way until he could make a motion to adjourn.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I may interrupt the Senator to say that he is entirely mistaken.

Mr. MORGAN. Am I?

Mr. EDMUNDS. You are.

Mr. MORGAN. Then I am mistaken in what my eyes revealed to me.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator is mistaken, if he will pardon me. Of course it is a matter of no public consequence. I had suggested, as the Senate Chamber was nearly empty, and knowing nothing of the contents of this paper which he is now speaking of, to my friend from Iowa that he had better let us adjourn, and he said that the moment he got to the end of the paragraph he would, and he did.

Mr. MORGAN. And thereupon, being very greatly surprised at what was going on here, and that the President of the United States should be treated with such excessive discourtesy, to say the least of it, I informed the Senator from Vermont in the open Senate that a message had been brought into this body which related to the fisheries treaty, and thereupon the Senator from Vermont informed the Senate and myself that the reading of that message could wait.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is true.

Mr. MORGAN. Thereupon, in order possibly to get the Senators on that side of the Chamber to forget the dictation of their caucus arrangement for a little while upon this matter, I called the yeas and nays, and the vote revealed a party division upon the question as to whether the President's message should be read, for that was the substance of it. We are not in the habit of adjourning at 4 o'clock these afternoons when the business of the Senate is very pressing.

Now, this morning, without our having had an opportunity to read the message, except through the indulgence of the House, finding it in the RECORD in the House proceedings, not having heard it read at the desk of the Senate on yesterday, we are precipitated into a debate about it. But I wish to say to the Senator from Vermont that his tactics are not available. There is no precipitation of debate that can ever put the friends of this message and of the President of the United States in the slightest degree of trepidation or bring to us the slightest degree of discomfort, because he has laid before the people of the United States in such a clear, manly, true, and American way the actual situation in respect of our relations with Canada that no covering up, no finesse, no apology, no excuse, no post mortem examination of this caucus victim that has been thrown before the country can have any possible effect to disparage or in any way to lessen the weight and influence of that message upon the honest American mind.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Will the Senator from Alabama pardon me for a moment? Referring to the most important part of this whole affair, and that is a discourtesy to the President of the United States, which I should be the last man knowingly to be guilty of, in adjourning with the message on the table, I find on taking up the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of this very day, that yesterday morning there was laid before the Senate immediately after the Journal was read, no less than six messages from the President of the United States, which had been delivered to the Senate on the day before or some preceding day, and which had not been laid before the Senate because it was convenient for the Senate to adjourn before they were; and so it is the case almost every day in the session.

Mr. MORGAN. We do not know what the reason was for withholding the reading of those messages until yesterday morning. That is a matter of no consequence at all. But in this case attention was distinctly called to the fact, and the Senator from Vermont knew what the message related to. Therefore it was nothing else, I think—we feel that it was nothing else—than a petulant effort on the part of the Senator from Vermont to show the President of the United States that he entertained a sovereign contempt for him. Well, sir, I believe the President of the United States and the Democratic party both can stand that without the slightest tremor in their nerves. I think we shall survive that. The Senator from Vermont withheld his advice, which is so very valuable to the people of the United States, during all of the long discussion upon the treaty. He did that, I dare say, because he did not think that it was appropriate to speak upon that treaty or upon any treaty in the open sessions of the Senate; and yet the Senator thought that it was appropriate by his vote to force us to do it. His vote would have saved us from that necessity. His vote would have saved this country from all the scandal and clamor and vituperation that has gone out of a political character against the Executive and against the policies of his administration.

That honorable Senator forced by his vote the Democratic party to an open defense of this treaty and to allusions to every fact that was possibly in reach in its defense and in its support, and he retired from the Chamber in lofty indignation at the idea that we would undertake to debate a question in open session that we were forced to debate by his own vote. Perhaps if we had enjoyed the advantage of his counsel during the progress of that negotiation we might have arrived at some amendment of the treaty, for it was amendable, by which the President of the United States would have been saved the necessity of sending in this message and trying to get us to adopt a policy which he thinks is a wise one and is least dangerous to our own people in trying to correct what is wrong and unjust and violative of treaty obligations on the part of Canada.

But in the progress of this whole affair, from the time the President sent his first message into the Senate in 1886 down to this moment, it now turns out, as we think the evidence clearly establishes, that the purpose of all this opposition to the President in respect of his dealing with these fisheries has not been to get the interests of the people of the United States into a better shape, but it has been to entrap the Executive, to put him in side lines, in a political strait-jacket. The effort seems to have been to put him where he would do the bidding of the representatives of the minority of the people of the United States who have in this Chamber the majority and deprive him of the option to do anything else than what they required and commanded. This party have gone so far that they have even threatened him with impeachment if he dared to disobey their commands and to countervail their will. I do not know that I was ever more disagreeably astonished in my life than I was when I read in the majority report of the Committee on Foreign Relations upon that treaty the language I will now put in the RECORD.

Say that committee——

Mr. EDMUNDS. On what page?

Mr. MORGAN. I am reading from the RECORD, page 8509, an extract that I made from the report.

These "plenipotentiaries" came to a conclusion of their labors on the 15th of February, 1888, and the offices of "plenipotentiaries" terminated, and the result was reached without the advice and consent of the Senate having been asked or taken concerning the selection of these public ministers, and without any communication to either House of Congress concerning this most important subject.

It is not difficult to see that, in evil times, when the President of the United States may be under influence of foreign and adverse interests, such a course of procedure might result in great disaster to the interests and even the safety of our Government and people.

That declaration in their report has been followed by frequent asseverations that the President of the United States was under the influence of foreign and adverse interests, and that he was conniving at and attempting to assist the British interests in the treaty of 1888, which he laid before the Senate, and which we rejected.

The report proceeds:

It is no answer to this suggestion to say that an arrangement thus concluded can not be valid or effectual without the advice and consent of the Senate, for the rights and interests of the people of the United States might be so neglected, misunderstood, abandoned, or sold by President's "plenipotentiaries" as to greatly embarrass if not defeat their ultimate reassertion in better times and under better administrations, though it is hoped that such will not be the case in respect of these negotiations.

The word "hoped" is used there for the purpose of indicating that it is the belief of the committee that such will be the result. It is their expectation that such will be the result, but hoping, however, against hope, they pray that it may not so turn out.

The report further proceeds:

The document submitted to the Senate by the President as the outcome of these negotiations may, it is thought, well illustrate the dangers of such methods.

But holding in reserve for the time being these grave questions touching usurpations of unconstitutional powers, or the abuse of those that may be thought to exist on the part of the Executive, the committee thinks it sufficient for the present occasion to deal with the document itself.

That is a distinct threat. Withholding for the present any dealing with the President of the United States in this matter, they think it is quite "sufficient for the present occasion to deal with the document itself"—the treaty. The dealing that they propose to have with him is in respect to the alleged abuse of his constitutional power.

The subject with which, according to the message of the President transmitting it, this document professes to deal is "the settlement of the questions growing out of the rights claimed by American fishermen in British North American waters."

The Senator who prepared that paper never means anything but what he says, and he never says anything idly. Therefore those who read these paragraphs in the report of the majority understand that one distinct feature of this movement was that the President of the United States was to have a rod held over him, and in the event that he did not see proper to conform his policy to suit the wishes of the majority in this body or to suit the wishes of the majority of the Committee on Foreign Relations he might expect hereafter that these alleged abuses of his constitutional powers will be brought in judgment against him.

I am very much gratified to know that the President is not alarmed at this at all. I think the country appreciates the fortitude of the man who can stand up against the utterances of the honorable Senator from Vermont and with cool, quiet complacency still pursue the line of duty without tremor and without any departure.

So we like him better since this message has come in. We have more confidence in him since he has been able to withstand this terrible rebuff. We think more of him since he has been able on this and on all other occasions to exercise the high functions of his executive office in the choice of the measure which he considers that it is necessary to pursue and the best to pursue in order to deliver and relieve his country from embarrassments growing out of misconduct of our neighbors in Canada.

The Senator from Vermont, at the head of the subcommittee about which he has spoken to-day, made a declaration to this body which I shall read. After having summed up the evidence taken by that committee, and having gone over a historical review of many of the facts connected with our treaty and other relations with Canada and Great Britain regarding the fisheries, he proceeds to say——

It will be seen from the correspondence and papers submitted by the President in his message on the subject, of the 8th of December last (Executive Document No. 19, Forty-ninth Congress, second session), and from the testimony taken by the committee, that some of these instances of seizure or detention, or of driving vessels away by threats, etc., were in clear violation of the treaty of 1818, and that others were on such slender and technical grounds, either as applied to fishing rights or commercial rights, as to make it impossible to believe that they were made with the large and just object of protecting substantial rights against real and substantial invasion, but must have been made either under the stimulus of the cupidity of the seizing officer, sharpened and made safe by the extraordinary legislation to which the committee has referred, whereby the seizing officer, no matter how unjust or illegal his procedure may have been, is made practically secure from the necessity of making substantial redress to the party wronged, or of punishment, or else they must have arisen from a systematic disposition on the part of the Dominion authorities to vex and harass American fishing and other vessels so as to produce such a state of embarrassment and inconvenience with respect to intercourse with the Provinces as to coerce the United States into arrangements of general reciprocity with the Dominion.

Now, a more distinct arraignment of a government was never made than was thus made by the Committee on Foreign Relations of this body, of Great Britain for the actual, willful, intentional violation of the treaty of 1818, with the exception that the Senator from Vermont in preparing this indictment against Great Britain did not specify the particular instances in which Canada had willfully and intentionally violated the treaty of 1818. He made a broad sweep at a very large number of cases which had occurred before that time, not stopping in his examination of them until he got back to the beginning of the treaty, so that all antecedent acts on the part of the provincial courts and authorities of which complaint was made in this report are referred to in support of the proposition that the treaty of 1818 had been intentionally and willfully violated by the Government of Great Britain, and that the acts, which are mentioned in a general way, of seizures and detentions, and driving vessels away by threats, etc., were in clear violation of the treaty of 1818.

I repeat that nobody can draw a paper in which a clearer accusation is made against the Government than is made in this report of the willful and intentional violation of the treaty of 1818 by the acts which are referred to in the preceding part of that document.

That report was made on the 19th day of January, 1887, and it was upon that report that the act of March 3, 1887, proceeded, which the Senator from Vermont now insists, as I understand him, was mandatory upon the President of the United States that he should enter upon retaliation and should abandon any resort to his constitutional right of attempting to get through with these troubles with Canada by the exercise of the treaty-making power.

The act of March 3, 1887, was carefully prepared by the Senator from Vermont so as to throw the entire responsibility of action upon the President. It was entirely competent after the declaration which he made in this report for him to have prepared a law containing as a recital, if you please, the matter set out in the report in hæc verba, and commanding the President of the United States because the treaty had been violated to proceed to retaliate, and then to have supplied him with the men and means to have made that retaliation effectual.

Here is the declaration, followed by what? By an act that left it in the discretion of the President of the United States to do or not to do these things. In the debate which attended the passage of that law, the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] wanted to know whether it was the purpose to force the Government of the United States into retaliation as the result of the action of Congress upon this question. The House of Representatives had passed a law very similar in its tone and purport with that which the Senate passed, but containing the additional stipulation—I do not quote the language, but I quote the substance of it—that the President of the United States should have the right by proclamation to exclude railway trains from coming into the United States, and thereby shut out completely intercourse between the people. Not merely commercial intercourse, but also, necessarily, to a large extent to prevent intercourse of a social character, to prevent families from having the opportunity of visiting each other, to prevent our delectable bank-robbers from having a chance of making a ready escape into Canada for the purpose of getting rid of responsibility to the law and finding shelter there.

The provision on that subject about which the Senator from Vermont has been reading from the report of the committee of conference has no sort of relation to the subject of the passage of goods in bond back and forth between these countries, not the slightest, as it was found in the House bill. That subject was left to be disposed of according to the treaty of 1871, and according to the laws of the United States based upon and enacted in connection with that treaty. When the Senate conferees objected to the conferring of this enormous power into the hands of the President of the United States, the objection was distinctly based upon the ground that it was too near an approach in our legislation to actual hostility. The ground was taken in debate by myself and other Senators that when we prohibit intercourse between the people of two countries, then we have got to a position where we would not be able to hold our own people in restraint, as I announced on that occasion, and could not do it for a month at a time unless we involved the countries in a state of actual war.

Mr. SHERMAN. I should like to ask the Senator from Alabama a question to see if I understand him. Does he claim that the twenty-ninth article of the treaty of 1871 was abrogated by the later notice?

Mr. MORGAN. I have not got to that, Mr. President; I am not near that.

Mr. SHERMAN. I understood the Senator to say——

Mr. MORGAN. The Senator will please indulge me. I shall discuss that question, but just now I do not want to have it interpolated in this particular part of my remarks.

What I am discussing is this: What power was it that the Senate committee of conference wanted to deny to the President of the United States in respect of this act of retaliation? It was the power to prohibit actual intercourse between the people of Canada and the people of the United States so far as the running of railroad trains was concerned. That was the whole thing. It had no more reference to the question of the transshipment of goods in bond through Canada to the United States or through the United States into Canada than it had to one of the Psalms of David. The subjects stand entirely apart, and so great a lawyer as the Senator from Vermont is confessedly placed in a questionable attitude before the people of the United States when he undertakes to discuss these questions as if they were one, or as if they were of the slightest kin to each other. We did not want—I did not want to put the discretionary power in the hands of the President of the United States, not that I distrusted him, to forbid intercourse between the United States and Canada absolutely as a measure of retaliation, but because I do not believe that in the absence of a declaration of war by Congress we could put a measure upon the statute-book that was more warlike in all its aspects than just that.

If we were to pass an act to-day that the people of Mexico and the people of the United States should not pass the border, that the railroad trains should not deliver freights to each other, that there should be no commercial intercommunication and no means of transit between the two countries, we would place ourselves in such an attitude towards Mexico as that a war would become necessary within a month's time. The Congress of the United States has not got the power to hold the American people back behind an imaginary line—on our side of it—by an enactment of that kind, until they bring the war power to bear; declare a state of actual war between the two countries, and then bring into actual operation all of the great and arbitrary powers which belong to a state of war.

So when the House of Representatives, as I thought, without due consideration, brought forward that feature in that bill, it occurred to me that for no purpose whatsoever relating to the then relations between the United States and Canada could that be supported as wise legislation, and I opposed it for that reason, and so stated on the floor of the Senate.

In all of that debate, so far as I remember it, and I think I do remember it, the question of the transshipment of fish in bond was not even alluded to. On the contrary, this report of the Committee on Foreign Relations before me shows that it was then the belief of the committee that the legal relations between the United States and Canada were such, whether they grew out of the treaty of 1871 or out of our own acts of Congress, as that goods might be admitted from Canada in bond and passed through our country without the payment of duties, and, on the other hand, that goods might pass through our country into Canada in bond, upon like terms. There was no disposition at that time to disturb that relation between the people of the United States and the people of Canada, for then this question of the proper way to deal with the fisheries question had not got into the narrow condition and shape that it is now, since the rejection of the treaty of 1888.

I am compelled here to make a statement which I regret the necessity of making at all. In 1886 and 1887, when we were passing this retaliation law, we were looking forward to some means of healing up the difficulties between Canada and the United States which had so long embroiled the two countries. Every man on the floor of the Senate knew that the time would arrive sooner or later in his history or in that of a successor in office when he should have to consider this matter upon a treaty between the two countries. If we retaliated and Canada yielded we could not consent that that retaliation and that yielding or concession should be a mere ephemeral matter that would pass away in a day. It was obligatory upon us and the Government with which we were dealing that whatever conclusion might be reached between the two, whether under the stress of retaliation or whether by a consensus of opinion or an agreement absolutely obligatory upon both governments, the final result should be stated in an agreement between the two countries, and be ratified as a treaty.

Why was this necessary? Because, as has been so often repeated in the debate upon the treaty of 1888, the interests between the people of Canada and the United States in these fisheries are joint interests—interests that can never be controlled and regulated by laws of retaliation. Two partners can not conduct business jointly when they are continually endeavoring the one to swindle the other, or when one is trying to get the advantage in accounts of the other, or when one is evincing a personal hostility to the other, or when one is interfering with the affairs of the other. Much more so is it the fact in respect of the joint tenancy in the fisheries, where men must anchor their ships side by side upon the banks and fish together, or where they must draw their seines if they are near the shore in the same waters, or where the bait that they throw upon the waters shall attract the fish so that each vessel may catch the fish from its own deck. So every Senator, when he was considering this retaliation law, knew that the only effect of it that was possible was to bring Canada nearer to the line of what we believed to be correct in her dealings with us, and that we could thereby establish a basis and foundation for a new treaty upon which we would, as we hoped, be soon required to act. Therefore in the discussion of that law of retaliation I was discussing a law that was looking to a treaty as its result. But it appears the Senator from Vermont was discussing a law that looked to war for its result.

I was not for retaliation then for the purpose of destroying Canada, much less for the purpose of destroying our own people. I was for putting it in the power of the President of the United States to retaliate and thereby to convince Great Britain and Canada that we had armed our own local authorities here with power enough to rectify whatever of wrong they might do us, and that we meant to execute that purpose unless they came to some wise and just and honorable agreement with us. If there was a Senator on this floor who had it in his mind to do something else, let him avow it. If there is a Senator here who believed that it was the duty of the President of the United States immediately to proceed to retaliate upon Canadian commerce for injustice and wrong which before that time had been done to us, let him avow it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Lest by silence I should be taken by the public—and I am very sensitive about that—to have acceded to all that my friend says, I wish to state, if he wants me to answer him now, that I am very far from avowing that anybody in the Senate thought the President under the law was to proceed to obtain redress for matters that had occurred before the passage of the law, unless they had then very recently occurred, for the statute itself, which my honorable and distinguished friend was so useful in helping to frame, provided that the occasion for the President's action should be something which when he came to act should have then recently occurred. We were looking undoubtedly chiefly to the future.

But I must say also in answer to my friend's question that I had no expectation and I did not know anybody then who had, that it was a lever for a treaty, and that that was all it was. The report of the committee, I believe, was carefully read over to every member of the committee, in 1887, and all concurred in it just as it was presented to the Senate; and I think that it is difficult for anybody now to read that report and fail to understand that the report thought the case could be much better treated by legislation than by negotiation, as all our relations with Canada, except for two short intervals that were referred to, had been carried on by what is called retaliation on former occasions until reciprocal legislation adjusted them. That is as far as I ought to go as a mere answer to my friend's question.

Mr. MORGAN. I think the Senator ought to go a good deal farther.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then I will, if you desire.

Mr. MORGAN. I think the Senator might answer with a good deal more clearness than he has yet on this occasion. His answer was in one particular pretty clear until by his subsequent remarks he got it thoroughly under a cloud and in a fog.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let me try it again.

Mr. MORGAN. I object to your trying it any more until I have discussed all that you have already laid before us. The Senator says that there were some events of a then recent occurrence in respect of which he thought retaliation would and ought to take place.

Mr. EDMUNDS. No, I did not say that.

Mr. MORGAN. Then I misunderstood him.

Mr. EDMUNDS. You have misunderstood me, if I may interrupt you.

Mr. MORGAN. Yes.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I say that the law having passed, the statute was carefully framed not to go into a retaliation for the events which had taken place, but it may have been dependent upon what the President found to have been then recently occurring. The act was passed on the 3d of March. If on the 2d of March, for instance, or the 28th of February, or the 1st of February, or the 1st of January, there was a case where, in a fair and public sense, a great official like the President of the United States would say this outrage has now recently occurred which Congress was looking to, he was authorized to act. He had a right to go behind the date of the act in that respect, because the description of the event upon which he was to act was made as clear as it was possible for language to make it.

Mr. MORGAN. That committee in its report gave a statement of cases by name, by the date of the occurrence, and some memorandum also of the facts upon which the committee thought that the Government of the United States might properly make the declaration which the committee drew up with so much of clearness and force, that the treaty of 1818 had been violated willfully and intentionally by Great Britain. There are the cases stated by the Senator from Vermont, and there is the declaration, and some of those cases were then very recent.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What was the last date?

Mr. MORGAN. I do not know that these are put here in chronological order so that I would be able to give the last date.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Do not give yourself trouble about it. I will look it up.

Mr. MORGAN. The Senator can easily find it, because he has presented the list of cases to which he of course thinks his remarks made in this report have the greatest application. Then the Senator drew this law. If he knew the cases then recently occurring that violated the treaty of 1818, why did not the honorable Senator put those cases in and make them the basis of legislation? Why did he not say to the President of the United States, "These cases have occurred, and this treaty has been violated, and here are the facts lying before you; and the Congress of the United States declares in a bill that retaliation shall take place, that the time for negotiation has ended, and that these cases are not a fit subject for negotiation?" Why not put all that in your law instead of requiring of the President of the United States first that he shall ascertain at his own peril what cases there were that were in the mind of the Senator from Vermont that he did not put in black and white upon any sheet of paper; why did not the Senator state the cases that had then recently occurred, or "lately" in the language of the act? Why was not all this disclosed, if the object of this legislation was to compel the President of the United States to put our commercial interests in jeopardy by declaring an embargo between us and Canada? Why were not the cases mentioned? Why was not the event specified? Why did not the honorable Senator from Vermont have the courage to come up then and say, "I will accept the responsibility as a legislator, and I will declare here in the presence of the world, not merely that this treaty has been violated, and willfully and intentionally and purposely violated, but it has been violated in these recent special cases that I now mention, and here is my remedy for that?" Why was not that done, instead of leaving it to the discretion of the President of the United States to ascertain these cases and act upon them? Instead of making it the duty of the President to hunt up something that is hidden from him, why did not the Senator from Vermont come boldly forward and say, "I will make the declaration of what the American duty is, and Congress shall back it, and we will have retaliation upon these people?"

I take occasion here to repeat a remark that I put into that minority report, that if it was the actual intention of the framers of this law to compel retaliation for what had occurred before its enactment, then the Congress of the United States abdicated its duty, and in a way that gives no credit to it at all, when it attempted to shift the responsibility upon the shoulders of the President of the United States.

In a matter that came before the Committee on Foreign Relations recently about three ships or three ship companies we made demands upon a little government for redress for some injuries that we asserted had been done to those men, who were acting under a contract with that government, which had been violated and abused and broken. We brought in, through the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, a joint resolution, which is now upon our table, in which we declare that Venezuela is in default about this matter, and that she must be made to settle speedily—I am not quoting the language—and all the forces of the United States are put by that joint resolution at the command of the President of the United States to compel settlement to be made. That means a declaration of war most plainly unless Venezuela pays the money within some reasonable time, or unless she enters into some negotiation or arrangement by which that money is to be paid.

Suppose you had put the language of the joint resolution in the act of 1887, then the President of the United States would have had no doubt or difficulty about the meaning of the law. But instead of doing that there is that sort of shambling about the matter which Canada and the people of the United States alike understand to amount to a mere declaration on our part that the causes which had lately taken place, some of which we did not specify, would justify us in retaliation if the President saw proper to resort to it; and if such occasions arose in the future that they would justify retaliation. But even in respect of that it was left to his discretion whether he would issue his proclamation or not.

Now, I will read the language of this act, because it becomes important in this connection to show precisely what it was that the Congress of the United States required the President of the United States to do:

That whenever the President of the United States shall be satisfied that American fishing vessels or American fishermen, visiting or being in the waters or at any ports or places of the British dominions of North America, are or then lately have been denied or abridged in the enjoyment of any rights secured to them by treaty or law, or are or then lately have [been] unjustly vexed or harassed in the enjoyment of such rights, or subjected to unreasonable restrictions, regulations, or requirements in respect of such rights, or otherwise unjustly vexed or harassed in said waters, ports, or places.

The President must be satisfied that these things have occurred. The Senator from Vermont was satisfied that they had occurred. He so stated in his report, but instead of expressing that conclusion of his own honest mind in an act of Congress and predicating his legislative action upon that, he abdicated the duty of directing the President of the United States to proceed to retaliate and retired to the ground of leaving it to the President to become satisfied, as he was satisfied.

The President of the United States has a right to be excused, notwithstanding the omnipotence of the Senator from Vermont in the Republican party, from taking his counsel on every occasion and under all circumstances as being infallible. The Senator from Vermont very modestly declined to put himself in the front of this matter and to assume the responsibility which every fair-minded man in this world would say devolved upon him after the declaration he had made in the report upon which the bill was predicated, that Great Britain had violated intentionally and willfully the treaty of 1818. He had not only made a statement of that kind in the report, but had gone on to argue in a most scathing manner against the Canadian authorities, that they had done it in this way, in that way, and the other way, all and each of which were utterly disreputable in their motives. Then the act of 1887 proceeds:

Or whenever the President of the United States shall be satisfied that any such fishing vessels or fishermen, having a permit under the laws of the United States to touch and trade at any port or ports, place or places, in the British dominions of North America, are or then lately have been denied the privilege of entering such port or ports, place or places, in the same manner and under the same regulations as may exist therein applicable to trading vessels of the most favored nation, or shall be unjustly vexed or harassed in respect thereof, or otherwise be unjustly vexed or harassed therein, or shall be prevented from purchasing such supplies as may there be lawfully sold to trading vessels of the most favored nation.

That is the second branch of the subject upon which the President is to be satisfied. Then there is a third:

Or whenever the President of the United States shall be satisfied that any other vessels of the United States, their masters or crews, so arriving at or being in such British waters, or ports, or places of the British dominions of North America, are or then lately have been denied any of the privileges therein accorded to the vessels, their masters or crews, of the most favored nation, or unjustly vexed or harassed in respect of the same, or unjustly vexed or harassed therein by the authorities thereof, then, and in either or all of such cases, it shall be lawful, and it shall be the duty of the President of the United States, in his discretion, by proclamation to that effect, to deny vessels, their masters and crews, of the British dominions of North America, any entrance into the waters, ports, or places of, or within the United States (with such exceptions in regard to vessels in distress, stress of weather, or needing supplies as to the President shall seem proper), whether such vessel shall have come directly from said dominions on such destined voyage or by way of some port or place in such destined voyage elsewhere; and also to deny entry into any port or place of the United States of fresh fish or salt fish, or any other product of said dominions, or other goods coming from said dominions to the United States. The President may, in his discretion, apply such proclamation to any part or to all of the foregoing-named subjects, and may revoke, qualify, limit, and renew such proclamation from time to time as he may deem necessary to the full and just execution of the purposes of this act.

Then come the penal parts of the statute, which punish with considerable severity any violation by any person of a proclamation of non-intercourse or of retaliation that is issued by the President of the United States.

There was a very broad field of power conferred upon the President of the United States to be exercised upon two predicates. The first was that he must be satisfied of the existence of these wrongs, and the next was that he must consider that, in his discretion, this is the best way to reach the subject and cure the evil.

If the President of the United States had gone forward under that act and had declared non-intercourse or had precluded by proclamation the coming of railroad trains loaded with passengers, supplies, timber, coal, iron, or anything else than fish, he, sir, would have gotten himself not only into the hot water that had been already heated for him, but he would have gotten this entire country embroiled, perhaps, in a war.

The language is "cases then lately occurring." Why was it that the Senator from Vermont put his statute of limitations upon the power of the President to inquire into these matters? When was "then lately?" Cases that had occurred in one year, or two years, or ten years, or twenty years?

Mr. GEORGE. Or three months?

Mr. MORGAN. Or three months. They were to be "cases then lately occurring."

Mr. President, there was a reason for that. That honorable Senator had been connected with distinguished administrations of this Government for many years back, holding a seat in the Senate of the United States and being of just right its leader on that side of the Chamber in almost every particular. He knew all about the treaty of 1871. He knew all about the history of these fishery controversies. He knew of the large number of cases lying back through Republican administrations as well as Democratic that had been unadjusted, which cases contained every feature and form of vexation that is found in those which had occurred during the present Administration; but he wanted to put a statute of limitations in there to prevent the President of the United States from resorting to retaliation, when his party before that time had not done it when they had possession of the Government by a two-thirds majority in each House, and knew of all these occurrences and had never opened their mouth in the way of protest.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BERRY in the chair). Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Vermont?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am sure that my honorable and distinguished friend from Alabama would not mean, even by implication, to make a misstatement or a distortion of the truth; and so I must assume that my friend from Alabama has forgotton that from 1854 to 1865, speaking roundly, there was no reasonable possibility of any occurrence connected with the fisheries taking place which would be of any special consequence; and that he also knew that from 1871 to 1885 a similar condition existed. Therefore it would not be quite just in him to say that the motive of the Senator from Vermont was ostensibly trying to do his public duty as one citizen of the United States charged with some part of its interest, to draw a contrast between a Democratic and a Republican administration and make a statute of limitations.

I submit to my friend from Alabama that he on reflection will be satisfied that that not only is not just, but it could not be, from the circumstance that the 1st day of July, 1885, was the first ending of the arrangements which produced—which saved us from any discontent—I will put it in the strongest way, stating it as he would; and that the treaty did not practically terminate (whatever overstepping of boundary there might have been by Mr. Bayard with the best intention) until the end of the fishing season of that year. There was, therefore, no contrast to be drawn.

Then, if I may remind my friend, he was a member of the Committee on Foreign Relations. He was as much consulted as, perhaps more than, any other gentleman in committee; and he is just as responsible for every part of that report (which I should be glad if I were alone responsible for, as a mere matter of pride, but I have no right to claim it) and for the language of the act itself which his great ability and skill helped to frame as the humble Senator from Vermont.

I submit to him, therefore, that it is not quite just to say that the Senator from Vermont was looking to party considerations in the framework of that bill.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, there was a period prior to 1854, reaching back to 1818, during which there was a terrible record made of occurrences and wrongs by Canadians and provincial authorities, and oftentimes by the British navy, against the fishermen of the United States, and with the exception of the cases of the Washington and the Argus, which were arbitrated before the commission that was organized under the treaty of 1853, no redress had been sought for those evils, and they remained there rafted up in vast masses of wrong at the time that that report was written, when they are referred to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. But, Mr. President, if my friend will pardon me, as we are trying to get at the truth, the Senator will certainly agree that the convention of 1853, of which the Washington and the Argus were two instances, covered every previous wrong of a similar character, and all the cases that could be proved were allowed, and those that could not were disallowed. There was nothing, therefore, left to the action of the commission by the treaty of 1853 that the United States had the slightest right to complain of.

Mr. MORGAN. The treaty of 1853 was a convention for the purpose of settling damages that were due from the Government of Great Britain to our citizens individually and personally. It did not take into consideration any national questions at all, such as dishonor of the flag, invasion of the treaty. No question of that sort came before the convention of 1853, and it could not come before it. The Government of the United States, whose flag had been dishonored and outraged, had omitted to make any demand of reparation for these private citizens; but a convention was formed in 1853 to consider the question of damages between a private individual of the United States and a foreign government. Then they came in of their own motion and got their damages; and now, because the private citizen got his money for the property that was taken from him, it is argued by the Senator from Vermont that that was a condonation and a healing up of all the international questions concerning the construction of the treaty of 1818 and the wrongs that had been done to our flag and country.

No, sir, those questions remain there undisposed of. They were violations of the treaty, not the mere capture of private property under circumstances that did not warrant capture. What the Senator from Vermont complained of in his report was the persistent and intentional violation of the treaty by these governments, not by their petty courts in the colonies or elsewhere. That is not the question—far short of it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator says that the treaty of 1853 did not cover these subjects, and so on; but the fifth article says:

> The high contracting parties engage to consider the result of the proceedings of this commission as a full, perfect, and final settlement of every claim upon either government arising out of any transaction of a date prior to the exchange of the ratifications of the present convention—

Whether presented to it or not. I appeal to my friend to say what public claim the United States had against Great Britain after this treaty of 1853-'54 had been executed.

Mr. MORGAN. After the Senator from Vermont has spent twenty years in the Senate of the United States and is one of the most eminent jurists in the country, that he should put a question of that kind to me surprises me. It astonishes me that he should attempt to identify the governmental responsibility between these two great powers for the violation of the treaty, with settled purpose, with the claim for damages to which that convention of 1853 clearly limits the jurisdiction of that commission. I do not think I need to occupy my time in going over that ground on the floor of the Senate. I prefer to pursue the tenor of the argument that I was making.

Then, here we have these unrequited evils, these misinterpretations of the treaty, these abuses of our fishermen in violation of the treaty of 1818 by the colonial legislatures, which is complained of in this report, and that occurred before 1854. Then came a period between 1865 and 1871 during which all of these troubles that have been engendered always by the treaty of 1818, when it came into control of the relations between the two countries, flared up into a bonfire. The whole country was in anxiety and in distress because of the renewals of these troubles between 1866 and 1871.

This treaty of 1871 was put into the extraordinary form that it was in order that the Republican party might buy its peace rather than meet these questions face to face and settle them. We gave the Canadians fishing rights down our coast to the thirty-ninth degree of north latitude, which they did not have before. We gave them, as it turned out, five and a half million dollars in money for the purchase of this peace, and we gave them free fish and free fish-oil.

That was considered good Republican doctrine then, and we used the fishery rights and all of the influences to be brought to bear upon British and Canadian cupidity by agreeing to large relaxations of the duty on fish, in making the treaty of 1871, in order to get money from the British Government to pay over to the insurance companies of the country, to compensate them for their losses by the Confederate cruisers.

I do not wonder that the Senator from Vermont wanted Mr. Cleveland to limit his proclamations of non-intercourse to cases then lately occurring, but it would have been a most convenient thing, an entirely just and manly thing, when these cases were put for him to consider and to investigate and to act upon, that there should have been some indication of what those cases were and what was meant to be included in the words "then lately." I think it was nothing but a trap set for the President. That is my judgment about it.

Mr. BECK. Suppose he had done then what he wants to do now?

Mr. MORGAN. The Senator from Kentucky asks me this question: Suppose that he had done then what he asks the authority to do in this message, what would we have done about it? We would have said, "You are acting outside of your authority; we did not put in that power at all; we did not give you any jurisdiction and control over that branch of the subject. It was not even debated in the Senate, it was withheld; and all we gave you the power to do was to prevent ships and goods from coming into the country, not from passing through it in bond. That subject was not mooted." And if he had done it I suppose that the threat which I have read here would not have been held in reserve, but it would have been executed or attempted to be executed against him by presenting articles of impeachment against him.

This report of the majority of the committee on the treaty of 1888 went into the question, to some extent, about the twenty-ninth article of the treaty of 1871, and says:

> In February, 1883, however, as the period was approaching when these provisions could be terminated on notice, both Houses of Congress unanimously (or certainly without any division) passed resolutions terminating Articles XVIII, XIX, XX, XXI, XXII, XXIII, XXIV, XXV, XXX, and XXXII of said treaty, which articles covered the whole fishery subject as well as certain matters of navigation, etc. This termination took effect on July 1, 1885.
> By the twenty-ninth article of the same treaty, which is still in force, the United States engaged that all goods, wares, and merchandise arriving at certain ports named and destined for the British possessions in North America, should have entry and transit without the payment of duty, and it was reciprocally agreed on the part of Great Britain that all goods, wares, and merchandise arriving at any of the ports of British North America and destined for the United States, should also have the right of free entry and transit to the United States, etc.
> That the forgoing mentioned article of the treaty of 1871 covered and included the transmission of fish from American fishing vessels as well as other goods is evident, not only from the plain and comprehensive language of the article, but from the statements of the formal British case laid before the Halifax Commission in 1877, wherein the right of the transshipment of fish from Canadian ports to the United States free of duty, covered by that article, was made the ground of claim for compensation.

So this committee commit themselves absolutely to the proposition that the right of transshipping fish by American fishermen was included in the twenty-ninth article of the treaty of 1871.

They then proceed to the following deduction:

> It inevitably follows:
> 1. That the right of American fishing vessels to transship their fish from Canadian ports to those of the United States was not derived from the fisheries articles and did not depend upon them;
> 2. That such right clearly existed by force of Article XXIX and did not depend upon any other; and
> 3. That Article XXIX not having been terminated, the right of American fishing vessels to enter Canadian ports for the purpose of transshipping their cargoes is as clear and unquestionable as that of any other American vessels.
> Under the treaty of 1871, with all the privileges granted to Americans in respect of fishing in British waters, the practical result was the diminution of American fishing interests and a corresponding large increase of the Canadian fishing interests, owing to the superior facilities of the Canadians in fishing near their own homes, and their right guarantied by that treaty to dispose of their fish in American ports free from all duties and impositions. It was this, doubtless, that led the British Government to refuse to terminate the fisheries article of 1871 when it had already obtained $5,500,000 as the established recompense for the superior (alleged) advantages obtained by American fishermen under that treaty.
> After the final termination of the fisheries articles of the treaty of 1871, it being apparent that the United States could not be persuaded or beguiled into a renewal of the so-called reciprocity with Canada, the former methods of unfriendly coercion and harassment were again resorted to and with great exaggeration. New Canadian laws, sanctioned by the home government, were enacted, calculated and evidently designed to effectually frustrate and destroy all the substantial rights that American fishermen were entitled to enjoy under the treaty of 1818, and to destroy the mutuality of the act of 1830 and the benefits of Article XXIX of the treaty of 1871.

Suppose those declarations were true at the time they were made, they were not affected in the slightest degree by the treaty Mr. Bayard negotiated.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Will the Senator kindly refer me to the page from which he is reading?

Mr. MORGAN. On pages 13 and 14.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Of what report?

Mr. MORGAN. Of your report.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The report of 1887 or the report on the treaty?

Mr. MORGAN. The report on the treaty.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator from Alabama kindly yield to me, that I may offer a resolution?

Mr. MORGAN. I will yield now to any morning business.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had non-concurred in the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 10234) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1889, and for other purposes; that the House further insisted upon its disagreement to Senate amendments 26, 27, 33, and 35 to the said bill, and asked a further conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses.

The message also announced that the House had concurred in the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 1661) for the erection of an appraisers' warehouse in the city of New York, and for other purposes.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

TOLLS ON GOODS EXPORTED TO CANADA.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator from Alabama very courteously allows me to offer a resolution which I had designed to offer at the appropriate time in the morning business, and as I am going to leave the Senate Chamber in a short time to be absent until Monday, I shall ask for the present consideration of the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested, if not in his judgment incompatible with the public interest, to communicate to the Senate copies of all communications, if any, addressed by his direction to the Government of Great Britain, remonstrating with that government against the wrongs and unfair treatment to our citizens by the action of the Canadian Government in refunding to vessels and cargoes which pass through the Welland and other Canadian canals nearly the entire tolls if they are destined to Canadian ports, while those bound for American ports are not allowed any such advantage, and the breach of the engagement contained in the treaty of 1871, whereby Great Britain promised to the United States equality in the matter of such canal transportation. Also copies of any demand made by his direction upon Great Britain for the redress of such wrongs and the replies of Great Britain to such communication and demand.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. MORGAN. I want time to examine it. Let it go over and be printed.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The resolution will be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will lie over and be printed.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting, in response to a resolution of July 5, 1888, a report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office in regard to improper and unlawful selections under the swamp and overflowed land-grant acts of 1850 and subsequent years; which, with the accompanying papers, was, on motion of Mr. EDMUNDS, referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. FAULKNER, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (S. 3017) for the relief of Daniel Donovan, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 4239) for the relief of P. H. Winston, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. SAWYER, from the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, to whom was referred the amendment submitted by Mr. STOCKBRIDGE, and intended to be proposed to the general deficiency appropriation bill, reported it favorably, and moved its reference, accompanied by a report, to the Committee on Appropriations, which was agreed to.

ERROR IN AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATION ACT.

Mr. PLUMB. I am directed by the Committee on Appropriations to report back House joint resolution 201, and as it is simply to correct an error in an appropriation bill which has passed, and is necessary in order that the money appropriated for a specific object may be made available, I ask unanimous consent that the joint resolution may be considered now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Alabama yield for that purpose?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. PLUMB. I report back the joint resolution (H. Res. 201) to correct an error in the act making an appropriation for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1889, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let it be read for information.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution will be read for information.

The Secretary read the joint resolution, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That an error in the act making an appropriation for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1889, and for other purposes, designating the "Ladies' Silk Culture Society of California" as the "California Ladies' Silk Culture Association of California" be corrected so that the same shall read, "Ladies' Silk Culture Society California."

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

Mr. PLUMB. There is an amendment to be moved. Before the word "California," in the last line of the joint resolution, I move to insert the word "of."

I wish to say that the language found in the bill as it passed was precisely as it came from the House of Representatives. The Senate had no information on the subject, and in addition this association was described by the precise name in the last preceding agricultural appropriation bill. But it has been discovered that in order that the money may be drawn it will have to be otherwise named, and hence the necessity for the passage of the joint resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kansas to insert the word "of" before "California" in the last line of the joint resolution.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PLUMB. In accordance with the suggestion of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS], and inasmuch as the joint resolution will have to go back to the House of Representatives any way on account of the amendment which has already been made, I will move to further amend the joint resolution by striking out the word "corrected," in line 8, and inserting the word "amended."

Mr. EDMUNDS. There is one other place of the same kind where that improper language is used.

Mr. PLUMB. In view of the language in the first part of the joint resolution, I think I will let it stand just as it is.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes; let it go.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the joint resolution to be read a third time.

The joint resolution was read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. MORGAN introduced a bill (S. 3484) to empower the President more effectually to carry out the purposes of an act entitled "An act to authorize the President of the United States to protect and defend the rights of American fishing vessels, American fishermen, American trading and other vessels in certain cases, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1887, and to authorize the President to protect American interests against unjust discrimination in the use of canals in the British dominions of North America; which was read the first time by its title.

Mr. BECK. Let the bill be read at length; it is not long.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read at length for information, if there be no objection.

The bill was read at length, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That whenever the President may deem it his duty to exercise any of the powers given to him by an act entitled "An act to authorize the President of the United States to protect and defend the rights of American fishing vessels, American fishermen, American trading and other vessels, in certain cases, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1887, it should be lawful for the President in his discretion, by proclamation to that effect, to suspend in whole or in part the transportation in bond and without the payment of duty of goods, wares, and merchandise imported or exported from any foreign country except Canada to or from the British dominions in North America across the territory of the United States.

SEC. 2. Whenever the President shall be satisfied that there is any discrimination whatever in the use of the Welland Canal, the St. Lawrence River canals, the Chambly Canal, or either of them, whether by tolls, drawbacks, refund of tolls, or otherwise, which is or may be detrimental to the interests of the United States or any of its citizens, it shall be lawful for the President in his discretion to issue a proclamation to that effect; whereupon there shall be collected a toll of 20 cents a ton upon every foreign vessel and her cargo passing through either the Sault Ste. Marie Canal or the St. Clair Flats Canal, and the Secretary of the Treasury may authorize and direct any of the customs officers to collect the tolls levied under this act. The President, when satisfied that such discrimination has ceased, may issue his proclamation to that effect in his discretion, whereupon the tolls authorized by this act shall no longer be collected.

SEC. 3. The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to make any regulations needful to carry this act into effect.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be considered as read the second time, if there be no objection, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. SHERMAN. I would rather the bill should go over until the President's message is acted upon. Let it go until the President's message is disposed of.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Chair understand the Senator from Ohio to object to the second reading of the bill to-day?

Mr. SHERMAN. I do; but at a later period, if the President's message is referred to-day, I should be glad to have the bill read the second time and referred.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill having been read the first time, will lie on the table.

Mr. TELLER introduced a bill (S. 3485) restoring the homestead right of Charles Weitfle; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. HAMPTON introduced a bill (S. 3486) for the relief of the State of South Carolina; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. CALL (by request) introduced a bill (S. 3487) to subdivide the internal-revenue collection district of Florida; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

AMENDMENT TO DEFICIENCY BILL.

Mr. HAWLEY submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the general deficiency appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

Mr. CULLOM. By consent of the Senator from Alabama, I move that when the Senate adjourn to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

The motion was agreed to.

FISHING RIGHTS OF THE UNITED STATES.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the motion of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] to refer the message of the President of the United States to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, it is proper now that I should make some examination of our statute laws as they relate to the subject of the twenty-ninth article of the treaty of 1871, not for the purpose of trying to demonstrate that the twenty-ninth article of the treaty is in existence or trying to demonstrate that it is not in existence. A majority of the Committee on Foreign Relations, in the report which they made upon the treaty which has just been rejected by the Senate, affirmed that the twenty-ninth article was in existence and continued to be in existence and that it applied to the transshipment of fish in bond from American fishing vessels through Canada to the United States. That view of the case has been denied by the British Government, and the colonial governments have refused and given notice of their refusal to permit fish to be transshipped by our fishermen in bond under the provisions of that treaty, contending that the fisheries clauses of the treaty of 1871 had no reference at all to the twenty-ninth article and were not covered by it in any respect, and that Article I of the treaty of 1818 prohibited our fishermen from the right to enter their ports for the purpose of transmitting their fish in bond through Canada.

It is well enough to look back a little at the history of this matter. Before we had enacted any statute on the subject of the Canadians having the right to go through our country with their produce in bond, the regulations of the Treasury Department based upon some law—and I do not know what it is—permitted goods to pass to and fro between Canada and the United States in bond without the payment of duties——

Mr. SHERMAN. That was the law of 1866.

Mr. MORGAN. It was before that.

Mr. SHERMAN. Before 1866?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes, sir; before 1866.

Mr. SHERMAN. There must have been a law for it.

Mr. MORGAN. I do not think there was any law for it. I think there was no positive statute for it, no statute bearing directly upon the subject at all. It was a regulation of the Treasury Department, which found its way, however, into practice, as I am informed. I am not complaining of it at all, because I think that it was——

Mr. GEORGE. Will the Senator from Alabama allow me to ask him or the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] whether the act of 1866 was the first statute on that subject?

Mr. MORGAN. That is the first statute, but the practice I allude to obtained before that.

Now I want to read section 5 of that act of 1866, and let us get at something of the meaning of it.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That from and after the passage of this act all goods, wares, or merchandise arriving at the ports of New York, Boston, and Portland, or any other port of the United States which may be specially designated by the Secretary of the Treasury, and destined for places in the adjacent British provinces, or arriving at the port of Point Isabel, Tex., or any other port of the United States which may be specially designated by the Secretary of the Treasury, and destined for places in the Republic of Mexico, may be entered at the custom-house and conveyed in transit through the territory of the United States without the payment of duties, under such rules, regulations, and conditions for the protection of the revenue as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe.

Mr. TELLER. What act is that?

Mr. MORGAN. The act of July 28, 1866, Thirty-ninth Congress, first session.

Now, in respect of goods arriving at New York, Boston, and Portland, or any other port of the United States which may be specially designated by the Secretary of the Treasury, to fall within the provisions of this law they must be goods destined for places in the adjacent British provinces, not goods coming from the British provinces and passing out of our ports, but goods coming to our seaports and passing duty free under bond into places in the British provinces. I do not know by what legislative authority it is asserted here, or ever has been asserted, that goods coming from Canada may pass free through the United States to foreign countries. That act does not provide for it, and there is no act providing for it that I have been able to find.

This act was re-enacted in the Revised Statutes, changing one word in it from "Point Isabel" to "Brownsville," and making only that change, and no other change was made or suggested at all; so that until we came to the treaty of 1871 there was no authority for passing Canadian productions through the United States under bond conferred by any statute of the United States that I have been able to lay my hands upon. It was a one-sided arrangement, we providing for the legislation on our side in anticipation that the Dominion Parliament, or whoever had authority there, would pass laws of a parallel kind granting the same concessions to us.

It was a mere case of parallel legislation; but it appears that the other side of the case has never been provided for, and therefore we have never passed any act at all to permit Canadian productions to pass into the United States duty free and out from our ports to foreign countries. Therefore it was the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to issue that circular that the Senator from Massachusetts read here to-day, to impose duties on goods passing through the United States destined for exportation to foreign countries. The Senator from Massachusetts argued and stated that this had been done by the present Administration and by previous administrations, if I remember correctly his statement on this subject; and he referred to it as being something that was recognized as being legitimate and right under the provisions of the law as it stood upon our statute-books, but that it was in violation of the treaty of 1871. If I understood the circulars he read, I think he mistakes their application.

When criticising the President of the United States we might just as well, Mr. President, become students of the statutes of this country, for it appears, after all, that he takes a more critical view of them than do Senators on this floor. There is no law of Congress unless it may be the law keeping—if there is a law keeping—in force the treaty of 1871 that authorizes us to admit Canadian goods free of duty and pass them out from our ports to foreign countries.

I wish to refer now, after passing that point, to the language of the act of Congress ratifying and confirming and putting into effect the treaty of Washington of 1872——

Mr. EDMUNDS. Eighteen hundred and seventy-one; yes.

Mr. MORGAN. Yes; I was referring to the date of the ratification rather than to the date of the signature of the instrument.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That was the act of 1873—the act to carry out the treaty.

Mr. MORGAN. Section 2866 of the Revised Statutes provides for the carrying into execution of the treaty of 1871. It is as follows:

From the date of the President's proclamation declaring that he has evidence that the Imperial Parliament of Great Britain, the Parliament of Canada, and the legislature of Prince Edward Island have passed laws on their part to give effect to the provisions of the treaty of Washington of May 8, 1871, as contained in Articles XVIII to XXV, inclusive, and Article XXX of said treaty, and so long as said articles remain in force, according to the terms and conditions of Article XXXIII of said treaty, all goods, wares, or merchandise arriving at the ports of New York, Boston, and Portland, and any other ports in the United States which have been, or may from time to time be, specially designated by the President of the United States and destined for Her Britannic Majesty's possessions in North America, may be entered at the proper custom-house and conveyed in transit, without the payment of duties, through the territory of the United States, under such rules, regulations, and conditions for the protection of the revenue as the Secretary of the Treasury may, from time to time, prescribe; and, under like rules, regulations, and conditions, goods, wares, or merchandise may be conveyed in transit, without the payment of duties, from such possessions, through the territory of the United States, for export from the said ports of the United States.

There is the first time that there occurred any legislation in respect to goods coming from Canada into the United States and passing through in bond for export to foreign countries, and that was to execute the treaty of 1871.

Now, let us see the language of it in one particular. The language is "and so long as said articles remain in force."

Now, what articles? The enumerated articles—"Articles XVIII to XXV, inclusive, and Article XXX of said treaty." The express language of our act is that so long as these articles, which are mentioned in the statute itself, remain in force these privileges shall be extended to Canadian commerce coming into the United States for export to foreign countries, and also shall be granted to Canadian commerce coming to ports of the United States destined for places within Her Majesty's possessions in North America.

Now, are those articles in force? Beyond all question they are not. The act which executed the treaty of 1871 put a limitation by act of Congress—declaring the will of Congress upon the right—it made no difference what it might be under any construction of the treaty of 1871—put a limitation upon the right either of bringing goods in bond and carrying them through the territory of the United States for exportation, or goods landed at our ports destined for Canadian ports. Here are the various articles mentioned—from Article XVIII to XXV, inclusive, and Article XXX in the statutes.

Mr. GEORGE. Is it not merely a Congressional construction?

Mr. MORGAN. It is not merely a Congressional construction, but a construction and declaration of the ultimate power of the people of the United States, for no doctrine is better settled in this country than that Congress has the right to repeal a treaty whenever it pleases to do so. Therefore it can give a treaty operation just as long as it chooses to do so. If in doing so it chooses to interfere with the language of the treaty or its purpose the treaty falls. The supreme legislative power in the United States resides in the Congress of the United States and is not found in the treaty-making power lodged in the President and in the Senate. And a most happy circumstance it is, sir; for we should be here continually repealing laws by making treaties with foreign countries, revenue laws and all manner of laws that are not agreeable to the President of the United States and the Senate, if we had the supreme power to impose on this country obedience to our decrees and thereby to override the will of Congress.

So the President of the United States finds himself confronted with an act of Congress here. The act of March, 1887, made no reference to section 2866, Revised Statutes, not the slightest, nor has that act or that of 1866 in any way been modified by the retaliation law of 1887. It makes no difference what interpretation we give to the act of Congress in respect of the repeal of Article XXIX of the treaty of 1871, there stands that act of Congress to prevent the President of the United States from accepting the conclusion that that treaty is operative any longer than the very hour that is mentioned in the body of that statute.

They now say, why did he not bring this subject up? Well, Mr. President, why did not we bring it up? The President of the United States has been conducting his negotiations with the Government of Great Britain with the view of getting our fishery rights upon a reasonable and firm foundation. So far he has not attempted to touch our general commercial rights, neither those matters relating to the mutuality of the right of passage on the canals and through the Lakes, nor this right of transmitting goods under bond through the United States. These subjects have been omitted from the diplomatic negotiations which have occurred between these two countries, but they have not been forgotten. We had quite enough to do. It was a duty immediately pressing upon us that we should reform and reconstruct that treaty of 1818, which has been a very Pandora's box in this country, and it was the duty of a good negotiator to keep out of that treaty every question between us and the Empire of Great Britain which might have a tendency in the least degree to embarrass it. The Senator from Maine who sits before me objected to this negotiation before the Senate, because it did not go far enough. Among other objections to the treaty he complained that it did not go far enough; that it should have included all these troubles that have sprung up among our commercial men in respect of discrimination in tolls upon our vessels passing through the canals to the Lakes.

Mr. HALE. Does the Senator refer to some remarks made by me?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes.

Mr. HALE. Let me ask the Senator now whether, in view of this message from the President calling attention to the subject-matters which he has seen fit to embrace in his communication, the Senator does not believe that it would have been better in laying the keel of this negotiation to have included in it the subject-matters which for the first time we learn are now grievances in the eyes of the President of the United States? Would it not have been better to have had an all-embracing treaty, and was there not force in the objection made by myself at that time?

Mr. MORGAN. An all-embracing treaty would have included not only this question of the fisheries, but it would have included the Monroe doctrine, and the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, and it would have included quite a number of other matters.

Mr. HALE. Well, why not?

Mr. MORGAN. The Senator may say "why not"——

Mr. HALE. If these are involved in our relations with the people of Canada, if they arise, as I believe they do, in treating upon our commercial relations with the people of Canada, why not embrace them in the negotiation of a treaty that shall settle all these things? Why not make a treaty which, whether confirmed or not, would relieve us of the necessity of being confronted by a message from the President of the United States dealing with subject-matters that were not contemplated in the treaty that has been rejected and had no more to do with it than the Declaration of Independence?

Mr. MORGAN. I can give the Senator several answers to that, either one of which is good, and the first is that they are not kindred subjects, they are not correlated at all; for example, our rights in the Behring Sea and our rights in the Canadian fisheries.

Mr. HALE. If that is so, why has the President of the United States waited until the rejection of the treaty by the Senate to launch these subjects on the Senate? If they have no relation to the treaty why bring them up at this time?

Mr. MORGAN. The Senator evidently did not understand what I said. I said the subject of the Behring Sea fisheries has no bearing upon the subject of the fisheries on the northeastern coast any more than the Monroe doctrine has; not a bit. They are various and very different things, and each of them requires the attention of more than one man. There are always two parties to a treaty. Great Britain did not send her plenipotentiaries here charged with the duty of negotiating with us as to anything except the treaty of 1818. She limited the discussion to that. We could not have brought it in if we had chosen to do so. Certainly no man could say to Great Britain, "Because you bring in a modification of the treaty of 1818 you must conclude to bring in also every subject of discussion between the two Governments, no matter how disconnected with the subjects immediately in hand, before we can agree upon the subjects you propose to discuss."

Mr. HALE. Do I interfere with the Senator by asking him a question?

Mr. MORGAN. No, I do not know that the Senator does.

Mr. HALE. Will the Senator claim, if one power proposes to negotiate upon a certain basis with another and a coequal power with regard to a certain subject-matter, that it is not in the line of diplomacy, strictly, for the other power to suggest and insist that the negotiation shall take a wider range? The Senator must know that in the course of negotiations between the great powers and the small powers of the earth that is continually being done? One great fault I found with the negotiation of the rejected treaty (and that was one of the points I made at the time alluded to by the Senator from Alabama) was that when a proposal was made to negotiate, instead of keeping it narrowed down to the subject-matters that were considered, they should have made it embrace other subject-matters, and there is nothing that bears testimony to the force of that proposition so much as the message the President has just sent to us upon these various subject-matters. They ought all to have been combined and negotiated upon, and then there would have been no occasion for retaliation.

Mr. MORGAN. If we had to take Republican opinion from all the variety of conflicting sources from which it is derived here, or from which it is promulgated, we should have a variable batch of it. Here is one committee and there are various Senators denouncing the President of the United States for entering into any negotiation on the subject of the fisheries at all, or any other subject, so far as that is concerned. Other Senators come in here and ask why the President did not take the universal world into the scope of his negotiation.

Mr. HALE. The President selected a subject-matter that did not need the interposition of the treaty-making power, and has now called our attention to these other matters that his Administration neglected entirely.

Mr. MORGAN. I repeat, Mr. President, what I said awhile ago, that when we have commissioners accredited to this Government to treat on certain subjects, we are not expected to spread the treaty over a much longer list of topics.

We have had a number of propositions in regard to the fisheries treaty. Propositions were made by the commissioners at the time of the treaty of 1818 and the treaty of 1854 and the treaty of 1871, to which each replied, "My Government has not authorized me to treat on that topic at all, therefore I can not consider it." So in making the treaty of Ghent this matter of the fisheries was brought forward, but its discussion was refused. So when a commissioner comes here to make a treaty we must take him with his instructions and say that we will treat with him on that subject or we will not.

In regard to this fisheries treaty, the foreign commissioners came here specially charged to treat of that subject, and also to treat of reciprocity. Mr. Bayard and his associates said, "We are not authorized by the United States to treat of reciprocity at all, and we will throw that subject out"—an example found in the very case we are considering. So I think it is hardly worth while to discuss a question of that kind.

We are discussing the question of what are the relations of the United States and Canada as expressed by treaty, and we are trying to account for why it was that the President of the United States did not take up the treaty of 1871 and have an adjustment of it, and have an agreement made as to whether Article XXIX was in force or was not, and also whether Great Britain had broken the treaty regarding the transportation of goods and passengers across the Canadian canals and on the northern lakes.

Mr. HALE. I will not interrupt the Senator if he does not wish me to do so.

Mr. MORGAN. Well, I do not think there is any value in this debate at all.

Mr. HALE. Then I will wait until the Senator takes his seat.

Mr. MORGAN. When the President of the United States negotiated the treaty of 1888 he did not touch on this question—the twenty-ninth article of the treaty of 1871. You ask, "Why did he not do it?" I reply that it was not the subject of the instructions of the British commissioners. Our Government had never taken a stand upon that question in any of its departments; but you have now compelled the President of the United States to resort to retaliation by denying him the right and privilege of exerting his powers, his diplomatic powers, in respect of the fisheries treaty of 1818 or any fisheries right that we have got.

The Senate of the United States has notified him in the most solemn manner that it makes no difference what treaty he negotiates with Great Britain in respect of these fishery rights, it is not to have any consideration here. You say to him, "You must proceed with retaliation; you must take that discretionary law, that permissive law of March 3, 1887, and you must construe that now to be a mandatory law." The President of the United States says to you, "I find another statute in my way here, and I want you to remove it or I want you to explain it by Congressional action. I find a statute here which puts an end to the twenty-ninth article of the treaty of 1871 by its express terms." And it makes no difference how you construe the treaty or how anybody else may construe it, that article of the treaty has been destroyed in its operation and effect in this country, so far as the Executive power is concerned, by the act of March 1, 1873.

He comes to the Congress of the United States and says "I am willing and anxious to do all I can to redress the wrongs of the American fishermen and the American people caused by Canadian interference, but I find this statute barring my way. I find that you omitted from the act of 1887 the power to retaliate by stopping Canadian goods from passing duty free through the United States. I think the safest retaliation is to exclude from the right of transit through the United States the products of Canada from ports abroad and from our ports of the United States into the ports of Canada amounting to very nearly $300,000,000 in the last six years without paying duty. I desire to stop this if I am under a compulsion to retaliate, because in doing so the heaviest part of this blow will fall upon the Canadian people, not upon our own people." And he asks the Congress of the United States whether he has the right to do that under the law as it stands. If he has not that right he asks for it. It was a Congressional act that put the difficulty in his way, if it is there, and he says, "Remove that if you want retaliation, and I will place an embargo upon the goods passing both ways, back and forth, unless they pay duty."

Mr. President, that is something that we ought to have considered. When we impose the duty on the President of the United States of making retaliation upon Canadian commerce at his discretion and after he has investigated the subject and at his peril, we ought to have been careful to see whether we would not violate the twenty-ninth article of the treaty of 1871. It seems that we adroitly shunned that question. No, sir. That was not the thing that was wanted to be done. These railroads—the Grand Trunk and the other lines running out from the northeastern parts through Maine, New Hampshire, and Vermont which have borne in six years about $300,000,000 of commerce back and forth to and from Canada, were valuable property. They were money-paying institutions. They were a great convenience to that country. They enriched the merchants at the terminal points and furnished facilities to the people along the way, and the earnest purpose that has attended every step in this whole legislative proceeding, and has marked every step in respect of this legislation with careful guards—the earnest purpose has been to keep the hands of Congress and of the President of the United States off these railroads. It made no difference who else it might fall upon, they were not to share the burden of the retaliatory law of 1887. They have been the pets of the Republican party of this Senate, nurtured by it, watched over, hugged to its bosom, and sheltered and protected against the amendments that were brought in here by the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN] and urged upon this Senate when the act of 1873 was passed.

Mr. FRYE. The Senator voted against it, did he not?

Mr. MORGAN. I did; I voted against it. I did not then believe that that act as the House passed it could be made effective without stopping intercourse with Canada. I believe it now firmly in the new form presented in the message we are discussing. The evidence has satisfied me that I was wrong about it. My vote ought to have been given to include those railroads in the power of the President to prohibit intercourse. I did not then believe that we meant commercial war by the act of 1887. Now I do believe it. I am now quite satisfied that if we will give the President of the United States power to prevent the passage of goods in bond free of duty over these railroads we will touch the whole subject right at the core, and then two sets of people will be convinced that a fair treaty is the best remedy. The railroads and their managers in the Northeastern States, and the Canadians, will be convinced, and then we will have peace on the basis of a fair treaty. Then we will have an agreement, and whether Mr. Cleveland is elected or whether Mr. Harrison is elected it will make no difference. The winds of December will not have blown across this country until Canada and the people of the United States will be in accord through a treaty that will have been brought here, and we will ratify it, notwithstanding our solemn declaration in the report of the Committee on Foreign Relations that the fisheries treaty of 1818 and the fisheries question are not fit subjects of negotiation.

You compel the President of the United States to retaliate, and yet you take the greatest possible care that in the exercise of the power of retaliation certain of your great and overmastering railroad interests shall be taken care of, and shall not be interfered with. Your candidate for the Vice-Presidency is now, or if he is not now he was up to a recent date, a director in one of those roads.

Mr. CULLOM. How about Mr. Brice and Mr. Barnum?

Mr. MORGAN. I expect they are in it; I have no doubt of it. I do not know whether they are against this treaty or for it; and I do not care.

Mr. CULLOM. They are directors of the road.

Mr. MORGAN. So is Mr. Morton a director.

Mr. FRYE. No, Mr. Morton resigned long ago.

Mr. MORGAN. How long ago?

Mr. FRYE. Long before the date of his nomination.

Mr. MORGAN. Well, I would not go by the date of his resignation. The time of his resignation is probably very recent; the date of his resignation is probably old.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I desire to say on behalf of, but without any authority from, Mr. Morton, the Republican candidate for the Vice-Presidency, who is dragged into this debate (which I supposed was nonpartisan), that Mr. Morton is not the man who antedates papers, and that his honor in that regard is as clear as that of my honorable friend from Alabama. Mr. Morton plays no tricks on the people of the United States.

Mr. MORGAN. Well, now, we have a sort of ex cathedra utterance from the Senator from Vermont not based on any fact he knows about it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Based on some facts that I do know about it.

Mr. MORGAN. I expect that when the Senator comes to the bottom facts in this matter he will be perhaps at liberty to change his judgment. We do not hear of Mr. Morton's having sold his stock. I suppose he must have done so. He must have been a stockholder in order to be a director. His resignation out of the directory does not amount to much if he is still a stockholder.

But what I wish to say about it is that gentlemen of both the great political parties are interested in these railroads in carrying, not merely fish, but all manner of production under bond and free of duty through the territory of the United States. If we stop it and let the Canadians take the St. Lawrence River as their mode of exit to the sea and their channel of importation, then you will find that that will make some impression on the Dominion and upon Great Britain also; then you will find that the Canadian Pacific Railroad will not be absorbing all the business of the different railroads of this country and threatening at this date to bankrupt the Union Pacific and the Central Pacific Railroads, over which we are holding a debt to-day of $113,000,000——

Mr. EDMUNDS. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wish to ask the Senator whether his views have undergone any change since the time that we passed this law that is now in force?

Mr. MORGAN. In respect to what?

Mr. EDMUNDS. In respect to the extent to which it was sufficient to go in the way of retaliation.

Mr. MORGAN. Yes, sir; my views have undergone a change.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator no longer, then, stands on this paragraph which he signed gladly in the report of the Senate conference committee on the 28th of February, 1887:

> The Senate managers have felt it to be a duty to decline to go to this extent, and have thought it to be clear that the provisions for the protection of American interests set forth in the Senate bill, and in that part of the House amendment applicable to any British violation of the treaty of 1877, are entirely adequate to the peaceful end in view, and that there is no present justification for reposing in the Executive this further enormous power proposed by the House of Representatives in its amendment and insisted upon by the House managers.

Mr. MORGAN. I have no occasion to change any view or any expression contained in the statement, but I do have occasion to object that the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] should undertake to identify what we were opposing or objecting to in that bill with the right of transmission or transshipment of goods under bond and free of duty through the United States or through Canada. They have not the remotest connection with each other.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then may I ask the Senator another question?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I will ask the Senator whether in his opinion the twenty-ninth article of the treaty of 1871 is in force?

Mr. MORGAN. I think it is not.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If the Senator will pardon me—I do not wish to go on without his permission——

Mr. MORGAN. Certainly, go on.

Mr. EDMUNDS. In his minority report on the fisheries treaty, which I had here a moment ago, the Senator, I think, had a different view—I think so; I will not speak with positiveness until I turn to it. Yes, on page 41 of "Miscellaneous Document No. 109, Fiftieth Congress, first session," being the minority report on the treaty, the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN], after first saying that Articles XVIII to XXV of the treaty of 1871 were abrogated, and no other articles in the treaty related to the fisheries, says:

> Article XXIX was not terminated, but it never had the least reference to the fisheries treaty of 1818, etc.

But the Senator now says it was terminated, just as Mr. Bayard in his letter to a member of the Interstate Commerce Committee—a public letter, of course, for public information—also stated.

Now, whether Article XXIX is reciprocal in respect of the transmission of fish over the United States and across Canada is of course another question. The British contention is that it is not, because they say the treaty of 1818 (about seventy years before) overrode the treaty of 1871, seventy years afterward.

Mr. MORGAN. What was the question to which I was addressing myself at that time? The Senator from Vermont had stated in his majority report that Article XXIX of the treaty of Washington was not terminated.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes.

Mr. MORGAN. Why, the act of Congress which terminated all the other articles from XVIII to XXV inclusive, and Article XXX——

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes, and the Senator says the same thing in his minority report.

Mr. MORGAN. I now say the same thing. Terminated by what? Terminated by the action of the United States Government in giving notice under the treaty. Now, I think the Senator from Vermont is lawyer enough, and I think he will credit me with being lawyer enough, to use phrases that have reference to the very subject at hand. I was referring to the question whether or not it was terminated by the act of Congress which gave notice to Great Britain of the termination of those articles of the treaty under the provisions of Article XXXIII. Therefore I used the word "terminated." If the Senator from Vermont had not hid an idea, as I think surely he must have done because of his very keen introspection into the statute, in respect of the limitation put upon the articles of the treaty by the act of Congress of 1873, perhaps he would have branched out in his argument and said something to us as to whether or not Congress had put a limitation upon its operation. And, whether Congress had terminated it or not, Congress had declared that that article should not have operated one day longer than the other articles operated.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Why, Mr. President——

Mr. MORGAN. I should like to know now whether the Senaotr denies that?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do distinctly deny that, because the act of Congress does not profess to affect the force or duration of any article in the treaty.

Mr. MORGAN. What act?

Mr. EDMUNDS. The act of Congress of 1873, to which my honorable friend refers. The act of Congress is providing for the conduct of the public servants of the United States connected with the revenue, and it says that so long as that treaty, or some part of it, I do not care what part or how much, is in force, every officer of the United States in regard to the revenue shall do so and so, and that is all it says.

It would be a very extraordinary performance on the part of the Senate of the United States, that being an intelligent and honorable body, after ratifying a treaty, and proceeding to pass a statute to carry out that treaty, to say that part of it ought not to be operative. The treaty provides that that article can be got rid of like the others, under suitable notice.

Mr. MORGAN. Then the President of the United States, under his oath to see that the laws are faithfully executed, can say that the treaty is not in force, because the act of Congress puts a limitation on it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The act of Congress does nothing of the kind. Will the Senator please read it?

Mr. MORGAN. I have read it carefully to the Senate. No, sir; the act of Congress of 1873 and the treaty of 1871, in their apparent conflict, stand as a bar across the way of the President of the United States when he comes to demand duties upon those importations brought in under bond. It is an apparent conflict that Congress ought to remove. It ought to give him a clear field of operations before he is required to execute any law or piece of legislation which excludes Canadian goods from coming here. He has a right under the act of March 3, 1887, in his discretion to determine the existence of the cause on which he would base a proclamation for the exclusion of Canadian goods, and of the necessity for such action, and to select the articles upon which it is to operate. He says here, "I find the treaty at an end, terminated by the limitations of an act of Congress, according to my construction of it, and I propose to make a proclamation that the Canadians shall not bring goods in here free of duty under bond. If I may exclude goods that pay duties, why may I not exclude those that pass through duty free? Now, let Congress say whether or not they are in earnest about this matter."

Why will you expose the general commerce of this country in which all of the small dealers, the small merchants, the agriculturists, the miners and the timber-men, all the industrial interests are concerned—why will you expose them to injury in your act of Congress, requiring the President of the United States, as you say you have required him (and you threaten to impeach him if he does not do it), to put an end to the commercial intercourse that we have had between these two peoples, and yet leave your great railroads and the rich traffic they enjoy out of the question?

Mr. GEORGE. May I ask the Senator from Alabama a question?

Mr. MORGAN. Certainly.

Mr. GEORGE. I wish to ask whether the recommendation of the President, if carried out, relative to the transshipment of goods as provided for in Article XXIX of the treaty of 1871, will that simple act injure anybody in the United States except the railroad companies who do business with Canada?

Mr. MORGAN. Not a human being. These railroad companies are thrown into direct competition with the St. Lawrence River. It is a question whether they would carry those goods or whether the St. Lawrence River steamers would carry them. When the St. Lawrence River is blocked up with ice, then the goods would have to come this way, and they would have to pay duties. As a matter of certainty the whole arrangement would hurt the Canadians and benefit our own people. But that is not the disposition evinced here.

The President of the United States is censured and threatened because he dares to stand between the interests of the people of the United States and the blow they must receive from this act of Congress. The demand that it shall be executed according to their will includes the demand also that he shall abdicate his constitutional powers—refuse to exercise his power—of treating with Great Britain upon the fisheries question until he has done something for the supposed betterment of the fisherman in the way of retaliation, and that will produce serious commercial distress to our own people, at the same time retain in favor of the railroad companies all this harvest of money that they have been gathering in carrying over their road three hundred millions' worth of property that they have been earning back and forth in the last six years. That is all there is of it. The question is not going to be submerged under the dust blown over it, and it is not to be buried out of sight. It will force itself upon the attention of the people of the United States, and the President's wise and beneficial recommendations in this message will receive their hearty approval.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. HALE rose.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio.

Mr. SHERMAN. I yield the floor to the Senator from Maine.

Mr. HALE. I shall occupy but a very little time.

The President's message is a desperate attempt to recover lost ground. It is a confession that the attitude taken by him and his Administration as to the treaty which has just been rejected by the Senate is an attitude that has no force in it. The treaty was presented and urged and has been kept before the American people as the panacea for all the ills that affect business and communication between the people of the United States and the people of Canada. That treaty has been rejected by the Senate, upon which the President of the United States, instead of acting upon the statute already passed giving him the power of retaliation as to the relations between our people and the people of Canada, comes in with a message demanding more law to enable him to set right grievances which for the first time he has brought out here, that rest upon our people owing to certain acts of the people of Canada or of their government.

Now, Mr. President, nothing has shown more clearly than has the President's message the wisdom and patriotism of the course taken by the Republican Senate in rejecting this treaty as a worthless treaty.

The President, by reason of the action of Republican Senators in rejecting this treaty because it was worthless, and because it did not reach the case, is now coming nearer to the position which any American administration that fittingly represents the American people ought to occupy. He is driven to that by the fact that his treaty which was urged upon us month in and month out as the panacea for all evils is dead and buried. And at once, in his distress, his treaty having failed and he and his Administration having been discredited, as we are learning by the English newspapers (which influence the Administration more than our newspapers do), the President attempts to take the view that we have been taking for months past. One can well imagine the conference of the familiars of the President, if he have any, after the defeat of the pet measure of the Administration, and when they realized the view that was to be taken, not only here, but by the world outside, that the Administration was defeated and humiliated—one can understand how the President and his associates, his familiars, turned to some new method of securing the confidence of the American people.

In some remarks that I had the honor to submit to the Senate in the month of June last I called attention to the fact that in dealing with this subject-matter the Administration had not embraced grave subjects which are now made the basis of the President's communication.

On that occasion I inquired why it was that in making up these negotiations the grave subjects to which I referred had not been included, and I predicted then that until a treaty was negotiated upon the basis of all these subject-matters there would be no accord between the countries affected, and no satisfactory result reached.

The Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] who has just taken his seat says that that could not have been done because the representatives of the British Government, when they appeared here, were not authorized by their letters of instruction to treat of these subject-matters. Why, Mr. President, that was not the time when the Administration first took cognizance of the subject. When the ship had brought here Mr. Chamberlain and his assistants, and when the railroads had brought down his Canadian associates upon the board, that was not the time for the Administration to interfere. Negotiations, like everything else between two nations or individuals, are set afoot long before the final instructions are given to the negotiators, and all the subject-matters that should be embraced in a negotiation are the subject of communications back and forth between the one power and the other before they are agreed upon. When the Administration determined that it would treat with Great Britain upon questions arising in the relations between the Canadian people and our people, all of these subjects ought to have been embraced. That is precisely what I said two months ago, and the Senator from Alabama was not able to make me an answer.

The President now sends in a message covering these very points. Why has he waited until this time? What is this message but the desperate attempt of the President to recover lost ground with the American people after the rejection of the treaty which fell dead in the Senate a few days ago, when the Senate voted it down? There is not a single subject-matter of the message that was in any way discussed, or considered, or alluded to by the negotiators of that treaty.

In arraigning the Administration at the time of which I have spoken, I distinctly referred to these very things—the transshipment of fish by us through Canadian territory; the treatment that is visited upon our people in the British territory and water ways, where the Canadians discriminate against us; the almost incalculable advantage that the Canadian railways gain by transporting their goods through our territory over and above what we gain from them, setting aside all the questions that arise on the Pacific Ocean. I stated distinctly that the treaty had nothing whatever to say as to these important questions. Why has the President waited until this treaty was rejected before presenting this appeal to the Congress of the United States? Is it because he and his administration are discredited, and this is the effort to recover lost ground? Why, sir, if the treaty had been accepted by the Senate and it had been ratified, there was nothing in it that should prevent the President from coming in and making this same demand with regard to the subject-matters of this message.

The American people will understand this. They will appreciate that the President has said to Congress and to the country that this treaty was wise and all-embracing; that it covered everything, and would be a final settlement of our difficulties. And we have had it dinned into our ears day after day by the Senator from Alabama and others that this side of the Chamber was unpatriotic because it did not accept the treaty. We have been told that the underlying objection on our part was a partisan desire to gain a partisan advantage! And now, after all that has been said, the President himself comes forward with a message demanding more legislation upon subject-matters that, as I have already said, are no more embraced in the treaty than are the words of the Declaration of Independence.

With the infirmity which has characterized the Administration up to this time, with the lack of ability to do anything in a direction that is American, the President does not now propose to do anything. He comes before us after having failed in his much vaunted treaty, to find fault with the statute that was passed by a Republican Senate and by a House of Representatives in sympathy with him—a statute putting the power of action into his own hands, which he has waited for eighteen months without putting into execution. He now states that that statute is not enough; that there is no power given to him to retaliate against Canadian aggression!

Why has the Administration been able to deal with the situation when it was not a question of our being protected, but when it was a question of giving undue advantages to Canadian railways and Canadian shipping companies? Then the Administration had no difficulty in dealing with the question of the shipment of goods across our territory or across the Canadian territory. The act of the Secretary of the Treasury that permitted a British line of steam-ships to take foreign imported goods at San Francisco, a port of ours, and transport them without duty to another port of ours, and to the terminus therefrom of the Canadian Pacific Railway in Canada, so that they might receive the benefit of the freightage of those goods, was something as to which this Administration did not hesitate.

There was no message sent to Congress then demanding that we should settle the point whether or not the Administration had power to give this immense advantage to that line of British steam-ships. When Secretary Fairchild issued his letter of September 4, 1886, giving this British company that advantage, making it practically an addition to the Canadian Pacific Railway, giving it the privilege of taking goods from one port of ours, San Francisco, and transferring them to another port in the North, and from thence to the Canadian Pacific terminus, nobody heard then that there was any question that Congress should give a construction of the right that the Secretary of the Treasury had as shown by his letter of September 4, 1886. The whole of that privilege was given by the Secretary, and that British steamship company has the same right now to come into our port of San Francisco that an American company has, and to take goods there and to touch and trade at ports of ours; and instead of our companies being given the benefit of freightage on all this vast amount of goods that come in, the benefit goes to the Canadian railway companies.

The attitude of this Administration is not one that raises a question between the railroads and the people, as the Senator from Alabama has said. The question is whether the roads that have been built by American money, the roads that have pierced the continent, and under which our great cities and towns have grown up, shall receive, as they should receive, the benefit of the commerce crossing the continent, or whether British companies, Canadian companies, whose roads were built by governmental subsidies (by subsidies that Great Britain herself gives for the purpose of increasing her military power and of increasing the thrift of her Canadian cities and towns) shall have the benefit, and not our companies and railroads. On that question the President of the United States never hesitated as to the power of his Administration; he did not apply to Congress for more legislation or more authority.

Mr. President, that act of retaliation, passed by Congress and approved by the President of the United States, gives him ample power. It is an act that is farther reaching and more extensive than any act that has ever been called forth in the history of the American Government to be exercised by any administration. These grievances that he now arrays before us so strongly have existed for the last two years or more, and it does not lie in the mouth of the President, with such an act as that at his command, to attempt here to recover fallen fortune and set back the tide of battle (which has been going against himself and his Administration) by this attempt to gain favor again with the American people. The American people will see through it.

Mr. VEST. May I ask the Senator from Maine a question?

Mr. HALE. Yes.

Mr. VEST. Do I understand the Senator now to assert that under the retaliation act of 1887 the President of the United States would have the power to retaliate as to the acts stated in his message? Would he have the right to retaliate as to anything except as to fishing vessels and the objects specified in the act of 1887?

Mr. HALE. I might answer the Senator, and it would be a very complete answer, by saying that I would be willing to wait and see whether the President would execute that act even on the narrow basis on which the Senator from Missouri sees fit to put it.

Mr. VEST. That is an entire evasion, if the Senator will permit me. He arraigns the President of the United States, as I understand him, very distinctly, because with the power in his hands the President has not exercised it.

Mr. HALE. I arraign the President of the United States because, for the first time, after his treaty has been rejected——

Mr. VEST. Ah!

Mr. HALE. For the first time, now, he comes in here and speaks of these grievances which have been existing for years. If he has not the power under the retaliation law to act in these matters, there is no sense in his having waited until now to ask for more power. The situation is the same as it has been for years past, and there is no sense in the President coming here now and making this demand after, as the foreign papers admit, the defeat of himself and his administration by the rejection of this treaty.

Mr. VEST. Then I understand the Senator to say, by implication at least, that that power does not exist under the act:

Mr. HALE. I have no doubt an act could be made that would give him more power, but under that he has such plenary power as if exercised in his discretion would at once bring this matter straight to a head, and we should know where we stood.

I did not mean when I rose to take up so much of the time of the Senator from Ohio, and I thank him for his courtesy.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I must confess that the message of the President of the United States gave me more pleasure than I usually derive from documents coming from that high authority. It is the first assertion made by the President of the United States of what I consider his patriotic duty in the protection of American citizens in their rights. Therefore I welcome his message with pleasure, even although I look upon it as rather in the nature of a political movement than as a movement in defense of American rights. I think very much as the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] has expressed himself, that this is a movement to retrace lost ground, because it is manifest that the treaty which we have been acting upon for a number of days did not excite the support of any portion of the American people except so far as it was dictated by political reasons to support a Democratic administration. So far as I know in the expression of public opinion there was a general condemnation of that treaty as totally insufficient to secure the rights of our fishermen or any American rights, as lowering the tone, under British influences and British promises, of the position hitherto taken by American diplomatists. Therefore I regard the message of the President with pleasure.

If the President of the United States had based his treaty upon the principles laid down in this message, there would have been no difficulty about the treaty; it would have been ratified, I believe, by the unanimous consent of all, because this message does assert the rights of American citizens, it does complain of the injuries done by the Canadian authorities. I do not extend that complaint to the British authorities, because I believe all these difficulties were merely local, growing out of a desire of the maritime provinces of Canada to press unduly what they claimed to be their rights. Therefore the assertion by the President of the United States of the wrong done to our fishermen and the rights of our people and the misconduct and injustice done by the Canadian authorities gives me pleasure; and, as I have said, if the treaty had been based on these principles we should have had none of this long debate; we should have had the assertion of American rights under the law of 1866. This law was passed in cooperation with Canada, for notwithstanding the impression of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] our statute was supported by Canadian law of a reciprocal character. This statutory arrangement was carried on for seventeen years, to the vast benefit of both countries. Those were reciprocal rights provided for, first, by our legislation, and next, by Canadian legislation, and under the laws of those two countries this exchange of products, this giving to them a short passageway to the ocean, especially in the winter time when the River St. Lawrence is closed, has taken place. It was based upon reciprocal legislation of the Canadian Dominion and of the United States of America. It was not based simply upon the laws of the United States.

Now, Mr. President, the main question in discussion here to-day is whether or not the twenty-ninth article of the treaty of 1871 was abrogated by the notice given in 1883 and by the subsequent action of Congress. This is made the principal point by the President of the United States, he affirming on the one hand that the twenty-ninth article was abrogated as the necessary result of the measures I have already alluded to. It seems to me upon reading his argument a very plausible one, and if I were to rest my judgment entirely upon the facts stated by him in his message I should be inclined to think that Article XXIX, being only tributary and incidental to the articles that were designated by the act of 1883, was abrogated with them; but this is a question that I would not decide upon the mere reading of the message, especially in view of the strong authorities to the contrary. It seems that the conferees on the part of the Senate, the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] and the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS], concurring, agreed on a conference report to the Senate on the retaliatory act of 1887 in which they say expressly that Article XXIX is still in existence and was not abrogated by the law of 1883. I will read but a single paragraph from it. This was signed by these conferees, eminent gentlemen, distinguished as lawyers and members of the Committee on Foreign Relations, and therefore presumed to be familiar with the subject. They report:

> When the United States abrogated these articles, that completely ended the influence of that treaty over our fishing rights. Article XXIX was not terminated, but it never had the least reference to the fisheries treaty of 1818, to enlarge its scope, change its meaning, or in any way to affect any right to which that treaty related. Yet, if that is not the true meaning of the twenty-ninth article of the treaty of 1871, this present treaty in no way affects that article, and it stands for all that it was ever worth in favor of our fishermen.

It was subsequently treated by the Senator from Alabama in his minority report at this session on the fishery treaty and also by the majority report as still in existence. Whether it be or be not has no bearing upon the merits of this question. If Article XXIX was abrogated, and is no longer a part of the law of this country, then, as a matter of course, there still exists the reciprocal legislation of 1866. If the article is abrogated, then we are remitted to the act of 1866; and what is that act? That act is simply a reciprocal agreement made to continue during the pleasure of the two parties, which by the express provision of our statute the Secretary of the Treasury might at any time for the causes stated nullify or revoke, and no doubt the Canadian authorities might at any time abrogate it—a mere legislative agreement made between two powers to exist only while the two powers consented to it. And what was the law of 1866? It has been read here several times and I will not have it read again, but it plainly conveys the authority to the people of Canada to send through the United States for foreign shipment their property, goods, chattels, and merchandise, without the payment of duty. There is a provision, also, on the part of the United States that all these goods shall go out free, but subject at any time to the regulation—I do not now recall the exact language—but subject entirely to the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury; so that it could be at any time abrogated.

I remember that the same law applies to Mexico, and at one time it was my duty to examine as to the power of the Treasury Department over that matter, and for a time the free passage of goods was suspended with Mexico by the Secretary of the Treasury. The plain provisions of the law authorized it to be done. At a time when there was difficulty on the Mexican border, when our whole commerce was suddenly arrested by forays and raids by Mexicans, the Government of the United States, through its executive officers, suspended the operation of this act and refused to allow shipments to pass through on the Mexican border. This was at a time when the laws of the United States were constantly violated by introducing for consumption free of duty articles that were dutiable in plain evasion of the law. The same power was exercised properly by Mr. Manning in the two orders that were read by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR].

I say, therefore, that whether Article XXIX stands or not, the power of the United States and the power of the executive authorities over the subject-matter is ample and full under existing law. If, as the President thinks, that article has been abrogated, the Secretary of the Treasury can exercise the powers provided for by the act of 1866 by suspending the transit of goods when the Canadian authorities do not observe reciprocal obligations.

If it is not abrogated it is none the worse for the American nation. If Article XXIX stands, we shall see that this matter is entirely within the control of the executive authorities upon the basis stated by the Senator from Alabama and the Senator from Vermont. The first clause of that article is as follows:

> It is agreed that, for the term of years mentioned in Article XXXIII of this treaty, goods, wares, or merchandise arriving at the ports of New York, Boston, and Portland, and any other ports in the United States which have been or may from time to time be specially designated by the President of the United States, and destined for Her Britannic Majesty's possessions in North America, may be entered at the proper custom-house and conveyed in transit, without the payment of duties, through the territory of the United States, under such rules, regulations, and conditions for the protection of the revenue as the Government of the United States may from time to time prescribe; and under like rules, regulations, and conditions, goods, wares, or merchandise may be conveyed in transit, without the payment of duties, from such possessions through the territory of the United States for export from the said ports of the United States.

This, therefore, gives to Canada on the one side the right to send her goods to foreign countries or to pass through our country back into Canada again, all the rights that are now claimed and which she has enjoyed to the extent of $270,000,000 in the last few years. But on the other hand, what right have we? Here I wish Senators to see what rights the United States have by virtue of this article of the treaty of 1871:

> It is further agreed that, for the like period, goods, wares, or merchandise arriving at any of the ports of Her Britannic Majesty's possessions in North America, and destined for the United States, may be entered at the proper custom-house and conveyed in transit, without the payment of duties, through the said possessions, under such rules and regulations and conditions for the protection of the revenue as the governments of the said possessions may from time to time prescribe; and, under like rules, regulations, and conditions, goods, wares, or merchandise may be conveyed in transit, without payment of duties, from the United States through the said possessions to other places in the United States, or for export from ports in the said possessions.

This is as clear language as can be framed by mortal man. It gives every American citizen the right to convey any goods, wares, or merchandise in the broadest terms possible, free entrance into every port and through any possession in the British dominions on this side of the water, the right to transship, the right to move them into our own country without let or hinderance, without exception or qualification, and without duty. That is the right we have under the treaty. If that is a subsisting provision of the treaty they can not deny to our fishermen the right to land in their ports, enter their harbors, transship their catch, and sell it in the markets of the United States. You can not frame language clearer. The British Government acted upon that construction, and during the existence of certain articles of this treaty, and until 1883, American fishermen did exercise this right, did go into the port of Halifax and other ports along the coast there and transship their goods. And they have that right to-day if the twenty-ninth article of the treaty is in force. If it is not in force, then they have the right, which stands unrepealed by the acts of the two countries, under the laws of 1866.

I will now read section 6 of the law in this connection, so that it will be seen according to the plain provisions of the treaty and of the law, one or the other of which is in force, that the reciprocal rights of both American and Canadian fishermen to free transit of goods and merchandise are equally prohibited by the law and the treaty.

SEC. 6. That imported goods, wares, or merchandise in bond, or duty paid, and products or manufactures of the United States, may, with the consent of the proper authorities of the provinces or republic aforesaid, be transported from one port or place in the United States to another port or place therein, over the territory of said provinces or republic, by such routes, and under such rules, regulations, and conditions as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe; and the goods, wares, and merchandise so transported shall, upon arrival in the United States from the provinces or republic aforesaid, be treated in regard to the liability to or exemption from duty, or tax, as if the transportation had taken place entirely within the limits of the United States.

That is, we had absolute, under this act, so far as the laws of the two countries provided for it, free trade or reciprocity. That law still stands upon the statute-book. So in either horn of the dilemma, whether we rest upon the treaty or rest upon the law, the rights of our fishermen are clear and unquestionable.

That is not all. The British Government, however, did put an end, according to the message of the President, to these rights under the treaty. At that moment the President of the United States ought to have acted, or if he had not the power he should have promptly, on the meeting of Congress, called our attention to the fact. Here is this significant passage in the message of the President of the United States:

In the year 1886 notice was received by the representatives of our Government that our fishermen would no longer be allowed to ship their fish in bond and free of duty through Canadian territory to this country, and ever since that time such shipment has been denied.

Two years ago that notice was given by the British Government and the right of the citizens of the United States conferred by this treaty, or conferred by these reciprocal laws if the treaty does not exist, was nullified, rejected, set aside by a formal notice to our authorities. What was done in consequence of that? Was any action taken? Was the attention of Congress called to it? Was there any proclamation made? Why, sir, under this state of circumstances stated by the President himself, the very moment this action was taken by the Canadian authorities, the clear and unquestioned right of the United States and of every executive officer of the United States was to disregard the reciprocal provision in their favor just as broadly as it might be thought to be for the interest of the United States to exercise that right. When Great Britain notified us that she would no longer concede to us the rights conferred upon the United States by that treaty, that moment the reciprocal rights conferred on her were at the mercy of the executive authority, and if the Executive had not power enough to give that notice as the British Government did, then he should have called on Congress for power to declare that the reciprocal rights conferred upon the people of Canada were at an end.

Mr. HALE. Will the Senator allow me right there to ask whether it was not upon the heels of this act of Canada notifying us that our privilege of transit and transshipping fish was to be taken away from us, that the Secretary of the Treasury granted this great privilege to these British lines upon the Pacific coast?

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not know much about that.

Mr. HALE. It was almost at the same time.

Mr. SHERMAN. No doubt the Senator is correct in his statement. I do not know about it myself, but I do know about this. In consequence of offensive acts by the local authorities, and especially the denial by the British Government of our rights under the treaty or of our rights under their law to transship our fish, etc., from Halifax and other ports, Congress in due time did pass the retaliatory act, which provides that the President of the United States shall have power—

To deny entry into any port or place of the United States of fresh fish or salt fish or any other product of said dominions, or other goods coming from said dominions to the United States.

So the President now has the power to prohibit any goods from coming into the United States and through our ports as well as fish. It is not confined to fish. My own opinion is——

Mr. GEORGE. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, if I am in error in anything I have stated.

Mr. GEORGE. I desire to call the attention of the Senator to the words in the statute he has read. It applies only to goods coming from the Dominion to the United States, and not to goods coming from any foreign country to a port in the United States to be transshipped to Canada.

Mr. SHERMAN. It includes all "goods" as well as fish. These come from citizens of the United States; they are brought by citizens of the United States. Our interests in the fisheries on the coast of Newfoundland are just as much part of our territorial rights as the State of Mississippi. They come from a region where we have territorial rights admitted on all hands, and come into their ports, the law plainly allowing all goods, wares, and merchandise of citizens of the United States to be brought within any port of the Canadian Dominion and to be transshipped. The fish here are not goods transported from England by way of Halifax into the United States, but they are goods transported from our own country, because on those Newfoundland coasts it is admitted on all hands we have an equal right with Great Britain and enjoy that right. The Canadian fishermen catch fish side by side with the Yankee fishermen, and they take their goods into the harbor of Halifax and ship them over a railroad built and owned by American citizens through the State of Maine to the city of New York and supply our people with fresh fish preserved on ice, while the American vessel catching fish alongside the Canadian vessel is not allowed to go into Halifax and transship those goods. Why? Because Great Britain denies that right in the face of the twenty-ninth article of this treaty that exists between the United States and Great Britain. But if, as the President thinks, that treaty is abrogated, we have the right under the law as it stands to demand reciprocity and to give to them the same measure that they deal to us.

Mr. President, this, it seems to me, covers the point. What I wish to say in all seriousness, and I say it without the slightest party feeling, is that I am glad we are likely to come together and harmonize on this old contention. I hope the Senators on this side of the Chamber are willing to make proclamation according to the ideas now advanced by the President. I say we can not be expected to permit Canadian fish caught on the Banks of Newfoundland to be carried over our railroads into the American market free of duty when the Canadian authorities will not permit American fishermen to ship fish caught at the same place to be transported over the same roads to the same market. Let it be understood that the American Senate is united upon that proposition, that we will insist either upon the enforcement of the treaty or the law; that we will have equal rights or that we will deny them the rights that they deny to us. If you are willing to stand upon that position, we will all act together. If the President needs more authority to carry out that doctrine we will give it to him without stint or limit. I do not see myself that he needs it, because either the law stands or the treaty stands; and the nullification stands according to the statement of the President. What more do you wish to do than simply to deny to them the same privileges and rights which they deny to us?

I assure you that the English people will not resist this plain proposition. They may negotiate in aid of their Canadian subjects and do what they can to protect and give the Canadian fishermen advantages over American fishermen, but when it comes to a question of equal rights between equal nations and equal peoples we will have no controversy with Great Britain. And this message of the President is a sign that he is willing to stand there, and if so I do not think there will be much trouble about this fishery question.

I do not want to weary the Senate now, as all this matter has to be debated over again; but I wish to say a word upon the other branch of the question, which is entirely distinct. Even there I am perfectly willing to stand where the President does. But it is entirely a distinct proposition, not yet considered by us. It ought to have been considered before. The Senator from Maine called our attention to it early in the session. I refer to the discrimination made against us all along the northern lakes by the provincial laws of the Dominion Parliament, about some of which I know, having looked into the laws.

What is the condition? When we construct a public work in aid of commerce, we make it free to all the world. The Canadian fishermen can go through the Sault Ste. Marie Canal without paying one cent of toll. They come into our harbors without any port charges or any taxes whatever that are not imposed upon American citizens. The general policy of our people in the Northern States is to encourage the Canadians, help them along, give them privileges and rights. But how do they do when we enter their jurisdiction? When we go through the Welland Canal we have to pay toll. That is not objectionable if the Canadians pay toll, because then we are on a footing of equality. They never have agreed to allow their canals to be free of tolls as we have, but they charge tolls with a view to their maintenance and improvement. But now it turns out, according to the President, that they collect the tolls from us and keep them in their treasury when the goods are shipped to American ports, but when they are paid by Canadian vessels to the same amount, and the Canadian vessels go to Montreal or any other Canadian port, they are refunded.

That is a condition of gross inequality far worse than any which the interstate-commerce law was intended to correct. That is not right. We ought not to submit to it, and we ought here again to agree that whatever measure they mete to us we will mete out to them. If they make discriminating tolls against us, we should make discriminating tolls against them. There is no other principle upon which two nations side by side can live.

Our nation is like a great big boy, with an overflowing Treasury, bountiful and generous, and careless what we do, not only for our own people but for all the world. When we are dealing with the Canadian people they are more careful. They look out for the dollar much more sharply than any of the Yankees that you think are so careful; they look out carefully, and now they are practically levying discriminating duties against our vessels so that there is an object in carrying American produce to Montreal to be shipped from Montreal instead of from New York or Oswego or Buffalo.

We ought not to submit to that; we ought to say so at once; have a united vote in the Senate, when this matter shall be reported back to the Senate, that we will insist upon reciprocal treatment.

This arrangement of sending goods through Canada and then to Portland is a matter of mutual benefit to the people of both countries, and if conducted fairly and properly there can be no complaint about it. If we get a portion of their commerce, or our neighbors get a portion of carrying goods across the continent, well and good; that is all right as long as we are on equal terms, and when we are not on equal terms, then an injustice is done to our people that we ought not to submit to.

Mr. President, that is all I have to say about this question. Let it go to the Committee on Foreign Relations and be considered there. This question of law and fact will be presented no doubt in due time. But I wish to say one thing more about the President's message.

It seems to me that the position taken by the President is a good deal like that held by him as to the payment of the public debt. My former old and honored colleague [Mr. Thurman] is going around through the country talking about the surplus money in the Treasury there accumulated all because we Republicans will not let it out. Of all the financial management that I have read or know of the worst is that by the present Administration. Here there was an accumulating surplus in the Treasury day by day and year by year since the first day Mr. Cleveland entered the Presidential chair. What did he do with that surplus revenue? He did not make proclamation of it for two or three years, but let it accumulate and accumulate until he did not know what to do with it. Finally the attention of the Administration was called to the fact that they ought to buy bonds with it. Well, Mr. Cleveland, with his sharp construction, thought he had not the power to buy bonds; he thought he could not do it legally. The law confers the power upon the Secretary of the Treasury.

The President had no more power over it than the Senator from Connecticut before me [Mr. PLATT] has. The law confers it upon the Secretary; it was his duty to buy bonds. What untold sums have been lost by his failure to comply with that law. Until recently, during nearly all the administration of Mr. Cleveland, the 4 per cent. bonds have been sold in the market at about 123. I have here the American Almanac giving the value of the 4 per cent. bonds during his administration, and they have been usually sold at 123. If the United States had quietly watched the opportunities in the way the present Secretary's predecessors had done, he could have gone into the market and absorbed those bonds to the amount of half a million or a million at a time and bought them up at the market price, 123; and then how much money would have been saved to the Government of the United States.

My former colleague says they have over $100,000,000 of surplus. If they had applied that one hundred million in the purchase of bonds they would have saved 4 per cent. per annum for three years—that is, 12 per cent. And besides, they would have saved 6 or 7 per cent. lost by the advance of bonds. At any time during the administration of Mr. Cleveland, if his Secretary of the Treasury had exercised the power conferred on him by the law, he might have saved the Government of the United States from 12 to 16 per cent. on the whole hundred million of dollars if he had invested it in bonds of the United States. But he would not do it because he had not the power. So the President sent to Congress and asked for power, just as he has done in this case, when he had ample power, and both Houses declared unanimously that he had the power, and then, after the bonds had gone up to 127 or 128, when he had lost three years' interest on a large portion of this accumulation, he commenced to buy bonds and complains that they are too high, and that he calls wise financial management. So now here is a law on the statute-book for over a year, to enforce a demand on the Canadian authorities that our fishermen who are there carrying on their hazardous enterprise should have the right to enter the port of Halifax and ship their goods under the plain provisions of the treaty or the law, and if that right was denied, then here was the law expressly prepared for that particular case to authorize the President, not to do any violent act of retaliation, not to involve us in any dangerous or delusive measure which would excite the public mind and probably create animosities between these two great countries. But suppose he had simply said, "Well, if you deny to the Yankee fishermen the right to transship their fish, we deny you the right to bring fresh fish into Maine, Boston, and New York, and scatter them all over, cured by ice," for that is the effect of it—ice takes the place of salt.

That simple remedy which would be the natural dictate of any ordinary man was never applied; but it could have been applied, and no man knows that better than Senators on the other side of the Chamber. And now when we have had a seven weeks' debate on the treaty, and the Senator from Alabama has filled, I believe, fifty or sixty columns of the RECORD in favoring the treaty, and it has finally been rejected, now all at once we are surprised with a demand for more power, more power, more power! Why, he has power enough to bring the Canadians to terms in twenty-four hours.

The mere declaration of these two points I have mentioned, that we will not submit to allow free fish to come into our market as long as they deny our fishermen the rights guarantied to them by treaty, and we will not allow them to discriminate against us in the use of their great transportation lines, but if they are free to one they must be free to both, if there is a toll to be paid that toll must be paid honestly, not paid back to one and never refunded to the other—if we should deal with the Canadians upon the principle of justice and equality and right, we should win their favor rather than cause their opposition.

I said the other day that I believe the measure of the future is more thorough, generous, liberal interchange of commodities between these peoples, and I think the result of all ought to be the union of the Dominion of Canada and the United States. It would be better for all. The very friction that is encountered by this fisheries trouble away off on the coast, all this question about the canals between Lake Erie and Lake Ontario, and all this question of shipping from San Francisco around to Portland in order to get cheap transportation over the Canadian Pacific Railroad, all the controversies that occurred in Manitoba when Manitoba revolted against Canadian authority and built a railroad to connect with one of our railroads—all these irritating circumstances are likely to increase from time to time, and they are increasing until the time may come when two great and powerful nations involve themselves in more dangerous controversies, which God forbid!

I believe that a policy on the line I have indicated, of generosity, but always of equality and of liberality, will finally bring these two countries together in one harmonious government, and that is what we ought to desire to see.

Mr. MORGAN. Will the Senator from Ohio allow me to inquire whether it was not the Republican party that put fresh fish on the free-list?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir; we did it to secure reciprocal advantages. We did it—what return did we get for it?

Mr. MORGAN. I do not know.

Mr. SHERMAN. If your Administration would only enforce reciprocity, for you have had time to do it, it would be all right. It would have been corrected if this was a Republican administration; but the treaty of 1871 could not be terminated until during your administration, and you took no measures to correct it.

Mr. MORGAN. If the Senator will allow me, I will say that we are trying to correct all the errors we can as fast as we can, if your party will permit it.

Mr. SHERMAN. Well, Mr. President, the Senator from Alabama does himself great injustice to make a party allusion of that kind. But if you leave the Republican party to prescribe the measures to get us out of this difficulty in which your Administration has involved us, we will make short work of it. [Applause in the galleries.]

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Alabama will please suspend. The Chair desires to admonish spectators, who are present by the courtesy and the privilege of the Senate, that demonstrations of applause or disapproval are not permitted, and if they are repeated the galleries will be cleared.

Mr. MORGAN. I am sure the Republican party through its caucus has had perfect control over the recent treaty which we have destroyed.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Republican party will take the responsibility of destroying that treaty.

Mr. MORGAN. I am glad to hear it.

Mr. SHERMAN. And will take great credit for it.

Mr. BECK. I rise to ask the Senator a question, if he will yield to me.

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly.

Mr. BECK. I ask whether there have not been three changes of our tariff laws, one in 1872, one in 1875, and one in 1883, the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] being chairman of the Finance Committee during two of those changes; and I ask whether he ever suggested that free fish should not be longer allowed? I wish further to ask whether or not in the tariff bill that has been under discussion for the last eight months in the other branch any Republican member of the House of Representatives ever suggested it during all that time?

Mr. SHERMAN. Let me answer the first question. During the time the Senator refers to he knows as well as I do that we were in treaty relations, and had bound ourselves by a treaty for ten years and two years longer until notice was given, and during that time we could not refuse to admit fish free without violating the treaty, and the Republican party never proposes to violate a treaty with any foreign nation.

On the other question, as to what was said over in the House about free fish, I do not know. I have never looked through the voluminous debates there. Will the Senator vote for such a proposition?

Mr. BECK. To do what?

Mr. SHERMAN. To put a tax on fish.

Mr. BECK. I said in a speech I made the other day that the whole object of this entire difficulty is to have the importation of fish prohibited, so that you can hire poor Canadians for little or nothing in the interest of Gloucester syndicates, and you dare not venture to stop the railroads in Vermont and Maine that are subsidized by the Canadians, as the President proposes, and if he had attempted to do it without asking for a law to do it the Senator from Ohio and the Senator from Vermont would have tried to impeach him for it.

Mr. SHERMAN. Let me answer the Senator from Kentucky who has not answered my question, by asking another. Is the Senator from Kentucky in favor of allowing free fish to come in to our market from Canadian fishermen when they deny to our fishermen the right to enter according to the terms of the treaty the harbors of the Canadian coasts, so as to exclude our people from competing with them?

Mr. BECK. I will answer that by saying that I will not punish the poor individual fisherman nor deprive the people of the United States of the right to eat fish. I will punish the Government of England or the Government of Canada that passes those laws and enforces them, as the President now proposes to do.

Mr. SHERMAN. Then the Senator from Kentucky is very much in favor of the poor Canadian fisherman, but he has no care for the poor American fisherman who is cheated out of his life-long employment and of the right that he has inherited from his ancestors for two hundred years.

Mr. President, I wish the heart of the Senator from Kentucky beat as warmly and generously for the Yankee fishermen of Gloucester—he seems to have a great pique at Gloucester; I do not know anything about the town; I have never been there—as for the Canadian. The great trouble is that he has no care for the poor fishermen of Gloucester, but for the Canadian fishermen his heart goes out like a gentle stream——

Mr. EDMUNDS. Like an impetuous fountain.

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, like an impetuous fountain. That is better. I have said all I wish to say in reference to this question, which no doubt will be the subject of further debate after the matter has been acted on by the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. GEORGE obtained the floor.

Mr. BECK. The Senator from Mississippi having the floor, will he allow me to say a word before he proceeds?

Mr. GEORGE. Certainly.

Mr. BECK. I wish to say to the Senator from Ohio that it having been believed to be the policy of the American people and in their best interest to allow fresh fish to enter this country free of duty, I do not propose, when trusts and combinations have been built up at Gloucester and Boston and everywhere else along that coast, to make all the people of this country pay $2 a barrel more for fish than they do now by pretending to punish Canada and England for something they have done, to repeal our own tariff law in a respect that no Republican has ventured to offer to repeal either in 1883 or during this long debate. But I will reach out, if we have power to punish at all, for the men who are guilty of the great wrongs that have been complained of, and I will not allow the bonded goods to go through the country, even if the subsidized roads in Maine and Vermont do have to suffer. I repeat that when the President comes in a manly way and deals with a great subject, and a bill is now introduced in the other House, and another in the Senate, I want to see how far those patriotic gentlemen will go to reach the evil complained of.

When they said there was no power and no right to negotiate any longer, if the President had dared to do what he now says ought to be done, the gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber would, as they have threatened to do in their report, have held him responsible for a violation of this very thing, and your articles of impeachment would have been attempted to be brought up before now.

He has met the issue in a fair way; and the Senator from Ohio gets away from the treaty and talks about this Administration not buying bonds and how much we could have saved because they have raised the price. I am done with that; I am not going into that; but I want to say that he himself was the man, both as Secretary of the Treasury and as chairman of the Committee on Finance, who arranged our debts in such a way that we could not pay them, and fastened this sinking fund upon us, that made us tax ourselves $50,000,000 a year more than there was any necessity for or more than the Government required, in order to enable the bondholders to rob this people out of the premiums now placed before them.

We are trying to get clear of those laws by reducing taxes, and for three years the Republican party have sat in the House of Representatives and have resisted every effort at reduction, and when a vote was taken two years ago for leave to bring in a bill, 140 men voted for it and only 4 Republicans could be found to do it; and when we tried again they voted it down. They resisted even the little effort made in the other House at this session, and to-day, after four years of cogitation to see what they can do, they dare not present a bill on which they will go before the country.

Mr. SHERMAN. I wish very briefly to answer the Senator from Kentucky.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. GEORGE. It is getting so late that I believe I shall resign the floor entirely and let this debate go on.

Mr. SHERMAN. I wish to answer very briefly the stump-speech made by the Senator from Kentucky, and I will do it in a reverse order.

He says I am responsible for the fact that there is the prolonged period of thirty years to the 4 per cent. bonds. He knows, because he was here the other day when I showed from the public record, that the Senate of the United States proposed to pass a bill to issue bonds running only twenty years with the right of redemption after ten years; and if the law had been passed in that form in which it was sent from the Senate none of this trouble would have existed; but it was changed by the House of Representatives, of which the Senator from Kentucky was then a member. I believe he voted for the House proposition against the Senate proposition by which the time was extended to thirty years, and they were not redeemable during that time. Yet I am charged with the responsibility of lengthening these bonds.

Whatever my sins, I can claim to have always favored the right to redeem the bonds of the United States as the five-twenties and the ten-forties were issued to be redeemed; and if I had had my way we would have had the same kind of bonds issued instead of the thirty-year bonds. Now, enough for that.

The Senator talks about trusts. Mr. President, the great trusts of this country are in the control of the Democratic party. They are like the thief who is crying, "Thief!" "Thief!" If the Senator from Kentucky will do as much as I to prevent wrongful trusts he will have hard work to follow. I believe that any agreement whatever, whether in the form of a trust or any other form, that tends to restrain competition in trade or to prevent production in this country is unlawful by the common law and ought to be made so by statute law in every State in the Union and by laws of the United States.

The Senator lugs in trusts as if they were a Republican invention. Who controls the whisky trust in his own State, and the other trusts? Who controls the great sugar refinery trust? Who controls the great body of trusts that deal in domestic products? Ah, this talk about trusts as a party cry has spent its force. They are the common enemies of the people of the United States, and I trust that all parties will take their share in preventing illegal combinations to put up the price of property, or to restrain production, or to advance the necessaries of life.

The Senator talks about the tariff. Well, sir, I am responsible for all the sins of the tariff, you may say, although I am only one out of several hundred who passed those laws. I believe the tariff laws of the United States since the war have been a most bounteous stream of wealth, have conferred increased wages, and done more for the health and comfort of the people of the United States than any other cause in the world.

The Senator is opposed to it all. He believes in the free trade that he brought from the old country with him, though I have no doubt the views are honestly entertained by him. I believe that it is the duty of the United States to give the American market to American productions, and to put such a rate of duty on every article we can manufacture in this country as will induce its manufacture here. I would make everything free that we can not produce here. Under the tariff laws as they exist (and the Senator says I have been responsible for their passage) more than one-third of the products imported from foreign countries are absolutely free of duty, and the other two-thirds are articles that enter into competition with our industries. We put protective duties upon those, and I shall continue to vote to do so.

My friend from Kentucky is very much in favor of the Mills bill. He thinks it is a little bit of a bill. It is just little enough to destroy one hundred industries from the very beginning, to cripple and paralyze great branches of trade, to reduce the wages of every laboring man in the country, to destroy the hopeful prospects in the Southern States, to bring desperate disaster and poverty where now there is comfort and comparative luxury.

The Senator from Kentucky and I differ and honestly differ, no doubt, upon this subject as widely as the poles. If I had the power alone and unsupported I would protect every industry and every branch of this country, North and South, East and West, without favor or discrimination; and to fully compensate the difference between the cost of labor in this country and in Europe I would make the duty so steady and so strong that everybody would be interested in it and interested in the development of this country; and then I would protect that policy from all combinations at home and abroad, from all trusts, and especially from consignments by Europeans to our country with a view to undervaluation.

That is my idea in regard to trusts and the tariff. Whether I have skipped any points made by the Senator's argument I do not know; but if I have there will be time enough in the future to correct any error.

Mr. BECK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE] yield to the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK]?

Mr. GEORGE. Certainly.

Mr. BECK. There will be time enough, if we can ever get a tariff bill before the Senate, to discuss all these things. I desire to say to the Senator from Ohio, if he thinks that I brought free-trade ideas to this country with me, that that was a good while ago, when I was perhaps a little bigger than these pages. I may have brought them with me, but I have endeavored as far as I knew how, and with the best lights before me since I have been a public man, to do what I thought was for the best interests of the country. That is all I care to say about that.

But when the Senator from Ohio talks about his own part in the transactions in this country I will show him, since he has challenged me and the matter is to be brought up, that he above all other men is responsible for the present condition of affairs in this country and for the surplus in the Treasury. Why, sir, in 1875, after we had reduced the war tariff only 10 per cent. in 1872, he raised the cry that the sinking fund was in danger, when he knew and had to report the very next year after he had passed the bill restoring that 10 per cent., increasing the taxes upon sugar, upon tobacco, and upon distilled spirits, and restored the 10 per cent., that the sinking fund was ahead of all its requirements $225,000,000. He so reported the very next year, when he became Secretary of the Treasury.

His predecessor in the Department, William A. Richardson, had furnished a report that he had in his hand when he came into the Senate, and under it the war tariff that had been reduced in 1872 on the demand of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] and all the leading Republicans in both Houses of Congress was restored, when he knew that the clamor that the sinking fund was in danger was untrue, and the record showed it, and he proved it himself the next year.

The Senator from Ohio talks about the sugar trust, and says that it is very dangerous. In 1883 I sat here day after day and night after night to endeavor to bring down the taxation upon the sugar that went through the refineries so that the people of this country could get it, and we made it 2½ cents, and he went into a conference committee with no Democrat in the Senate on it——

Mr. SHERMAN. Because they refused to go.

Mr. BECK. He brought it back when the other House never considered it, and none of them had ever looked at it, and added 25 cents a hundred on refined sugar, making it $2.75 per hundred instead of $2.50, which was the maximum that they could obtain for it by a vote of this body upon a dozen trials; and in that conference committee, without daring to tell that he had done it, when he came on the floor of the Senate on the last night of the session, when I was attacking his conference report, he walked into yonder cloak-room and never opened his mouth, and never told us that he had added on the additional taxation in that secret conference, which made the sugar trust possible to-day.

That the record shows, and the printed bills will show it. While there may have been some difference of opinion as to what should be the true rate of taxation, the Senate had agreed and the House had not disagreed, that $2.50 per hundred was all that they could have. He gave them $2.75, and put them beyond the control of foreign competition.

On the 13th day of last March, I believe it was, when I was making a speech on this floor and was proving, as I thought, that trusts were maintained to the extent of the tariff tax which excluded other competition, he rose in his place and denied that there were any trusts in this country, and the RECORD shows it. Now the Senator says he will go as far as I will to destroy them. We will see when the time comes.

We had taken off every burden that was imposed by the internal revenue upon our manufactures, upon incomes, upon everything but whisky and tobacco. Three hundred and odd million dollars were at one time collected from internal taxes, $127,000,000 of which came from manufactures alone. The tariff was increased because of those burdens; they have all been removed, and to-day with the tariff at 47 per cent., while the average paid as wages to workmen is less than 25 per cent. difference between here and abroad, an attempt to reduce the tariff from 47 per cent. to 42 per cent. is called a robbery, and free trade, and an alliance with the English and other foreign people to starve out our manufacturers!

The truth is that the struggle now is not to help American labor, for the Senator from Ohio stood by the importation of Chinese to the last minute, to degrade the American laborer. He stood by the bill that was enacted in 1864 to allow the importation of foreign laborers until after Mr. Cleveland was elected, whereby not only could men be brought from all parts of the world free of duty at the cheapest rate to drive American laborers out of the manufacturing establishments, but their importers could follow them and take away their little homesteads if they dared to run away from the men who brought them here, and sell the homestead over their heads whenever they ventured to leave the men who imported them.

All that met the sanction of the Senator from Ohio for twenty-odd years; there was not a complaint made about it; and now he comes out as the champion of American labor! He and his policy have beggared the farmers of this country until the mortgages upon men's farms are the rule rather than the exception. Our farmers have to sell in foreign markets at foreign prices and compete with the paupers of the world, and they are not allowed to buy what they must have unless it is from Mr. Carnegie or somebody who gets a million and a half a year by the bounty of Congress, and then has "the fat fried out of him" for a corruption fund, as Mr. Foster and your other men have demanded, to build up them and their machinery, for those are the only things that are protected.

Now the Senator comes and intimates that we are not acting in the interest of this Government if we dare to say that the war taxes shall be reduced. But I did not intend to go on with this matter now; I will hereafter, and I shall prove all I have said, and more too.

I will say this—and the Senator from Ohio may as well look out—that if it had not been for that very sinking fund which he proposed in 1875 an increased taxation to maintain, adding from $40,000,000 to $50,000,000 a year, the present condition of things could not have existed; and when the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] rose in his place and told him what would be the effect of it, and that he would have to pay premiums to those people, he shut his eyes to all the assertions that were made, and not only fixed the time of payment, which was all perfectly right, and perhaps the longer the better, but refused to reduce the taxes, refused to remove the burden of $40,000,000 or $50,000,000 a year from the sinking fund, which could not be paid off before the bonds were redeemed.

That has brought about the condition of things that exists now. But when I brought up the question years ago to repeal that law and wanted him to give us a chance to reduce taxes, upon a call of the yeas and nays, we, with, perhaps, but one exception, voted for it, and he and his Republican brethren voted against it, as I shall show by the record.

Mr. SHERMAN. Although it is late in the evening there are two or three points I wish to answer, and I hope the Senator will bear patiently with me. He used rather harsh language, but I shall not reply to that; it is not my way of doing business.

He talks about a conference committee reporting the tariff act of 1883. Mr. President, the most cowardly act of the Democratic party that I have ever seen in my long public life was the refusal on that side to appoint a conference on the tariff bill as it was sent to us from the House of Representatives. Just think of it! I doubt whether in the history of the Government, from the foundation of the Government to this time, there was ever before the absolute refusal of one great party controlling nearly a majority of the Senate to take part in a conference.

In that case a conference was requested by the House of Representatives, and a conference committee was appointed on the part of the Senate. Two Democrats, the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] and the then Senator from Delaware, Mr. Bayard, and three Republicans, according to the rule, were appointed. The Democrats refused to serve. When before was that ever done?

The Senator talked about my daring to do anything. It is not worth while to say that to me, because I dare do anything that I think is right. I ask him if that was not a cowardly refusal by a great party, and then to come right back here and say that we are responsible?

We are responsible for the tariff act of 1883. We are responsible for some reductions in that tariff that ought not to have been made, and for which we paid severely, and for which the Democratic party arraigned us; but it was the Democratic party in refusing to serve on the committee of conference that made it a one-sided report. Gentlemen on the other side ought to remember that; and it is the last thing they ought ever to mention.

Now, as to the sinking fund. The sinking fund we provided for by a law in one of the earliest financial acts passed during the midst of the war, in which we set aside 1 per cent. of the revenues annually, to be increased by yearly accretions, to pay the public debt. The Senator says that in 1875 I insisted upon the payment of that sinking fund. I did. He says that there was an accumulation of the sinking fund. So there was. For several years the surplus revenues of the Government were more than the amount of the sinking fund, and they were applied to the payment or the public debt.

The Senator from Kentucky claimed that the accumulated revenue which was applied to the public debt in excess of the sinking fund should be counted out of the future sinking fund. That was a hobby of his; and I think the sinking fund is probably the chief hobby he has, because every Congress he introduces bills to repeal the sinking fund, and yet they never pass.

I did maintain the sinking fund as a matter of honor, as a matter of right. It is maintained by this Administration. Where is the recommendation from Secretary Fairchild, or from President Cleveland, or any other Democrat except the Senator from Kentucky in favor of repealing the sinking fund? He stands solitary and alone. His associates around him vote with him out of a kind of respect for him. He is a good fighter, there is no doubt about that. They do not believe in it. I know there are men in my eye who do not believe in the abolition of the sinking fund, who look upon it as a violation of public faith, but they vote with him because they know it is a harmless amusement, and they indulge him by voting with him to repeal the sinking fund all the time; and he says I am responsible for it. Well, I am a pretty good scape-goat for all such sins as that. I am in favor of the sinking fund.

My friend again refers to the Chinese. Mr. President, I do not often talk about my record. Ever since 1872, when I saw the Chinese in California, I have been satisfied that the importation of Chinese laborers was a mistake, and that it ought to be ended, and I have voted for every bill upon the subject when the treaty between China and the United States allowed it. I would not violate a treaty with any foreign nation, especially with China. We had sent our embassador to China and we had boasted, all of us, Democrats and Republicans alike, that we had broken down for the first time in two thousand years the seclusion of that great empire of 300,000,000 people. It was a feather in our cap. When Mr. Burlingame came back with his laurels fresh upon his brow he was toasted and fêted in every part of the United States, and nowhere more than in California. They thought he had performed a great achievement for modern civilization, opened wide the doors of a vast empire.

But when the Chinese immigrants came in it was found that they did not affiliate with us; that they did not sympathize with us; that they did not bring their wives along; that they only came to gather what money they could and then go back to the country from which they came. Therefore an alarm sprung up against them, and as soon as the treaty could be changed to enable us to exclude them I was in favor of their exclusion. I have reported three bills here in the Senate for the exclusion of the Chinese. Every bill for the last two or three years except the one reported at this session at my request by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. DOLPH] has been reported by me as chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations. The committee have considered the bills without regarding it as a party question.

I have voted for the exclusion of the Chinese except only when the treaty would not allow it, and before the treaty was changed I would go up to the extent of the treaty, and when the treaty was changed I went on from step to step, until now probably the Chinese are excluded by a law as mandatory as any law can be made.

What does the Senator throw that into my face for, when men of his own party were of the same opinion, when all of us around here were of the same opinion? I dare do anything but violate a treaty obligation, and I would not do that to save the Senator from Kentucky I do not know from what fate. I should dislike to have him meet a very severe one, but certainly I would not vote to violate a treaty under any circumstances except one of dire necessity, involving the fate of our country. That is the theory upon which a treaty rests. It is an obligation between two proud and spirited nations, and it ought never to be violated except by mutual consent. That is the ground upon which we on this side of the Chamber have acted.

My friend now who is candidate for President of the United States, and who I sincerely believe will be elected, stood in the same position. He was a member also of the Committee on Foreign Relations. The Senator from Vermont and the rest of us around here all voted for these bills just as rapidly and as fast as our treaty relations would allow us to do, and we went to the extreme verge. The last bill was passed in the Senate before the last treaty negotiated by this Administration was ratified by the contracting parties, and we sent it to the House and they passed it in the form in which we had passed it.

Now, it is merely a tub to the whale to talk about Chinese in the Senate of the United States. It would do very well in the far inward counties of Kentucky, clear on the hill tops; it would not be good in Lexington or Louisville, or any such place, but he might possibly tell that in the mountains of Kentucky.

The Senator said something about trusts. He says I said there were no trusts. What I said was that there were no considerable trusts in the foreign trade. The only trusts that exist there are trusts by commission where manufacturers in Europe send over their goods, transmit them to a commission merchant as a trustee, because he becomes a trust sometimes for many merchants in the same line of trade. That kind of trust has been exposed. Suppose a particular merchant or dealer in New York should be made a consignee and a trustee for a great many houses producing a particular line of goods, and they are sent all to him and no market price is fixed. He becomes a trustee. That kind of trust I have always been in favor of breaking down, and I think the Senator from Kentucky is; but when you come to some other trusts he is not so anxious about them. But we shall have enough time in the future to talk about trusts.

I hope now that the message of the President will be referred.

Mr. CULLOM. I am satisfied we shall not be able to conclude the disposition of the question to-night. I move, therefore, that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. BUTLER. The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE] has the floor.

Mr. CULLOM. I thought he relinquished it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Mississippi was recognized by the Chair, and yielded to the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] and to the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN].

Mr. CULLOM. I do not desire to interfere with the Senator from Mississippi taking the floor on this question if he wishes to do so. Does the Senator desire to proceed to-night?

Mr. GEORGE. I do not; but I should like to have the floor and go on with my remarks on Monday morning.

Mr. CULLOM. The Senator desires to take the floor, but not to address the Senate to-night. I yield to the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] for the purpose of submitting a conference report.

APPRAISERS' WAREHOUSE IN NEW YORK.

Mr. SPOONER submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 1661) for the erection of an appraisers' warehouse in the city of New York, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 2, 3, 4, 6, and 7, respectively, and agree to the same with the following amendment: In lines 17 and 18, first page, strike out the words "seven hundred" and insert in lieu thereof the words "six hundred and fifty;" and that the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 5, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out the word "three" in said amendment and insert the word "two" in lieu there of;" and that the Senate agree to the same.

JOHN C. SPOONER,
WM. M. EVARTS,
JNO. W. DANIEL,
Managers on the part of the Senate.
SAMUEL DIBBLE,
S. S. COX,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us hear the action of the House read.

Mr. SPOONER. The House has adopted the report.

The Secretary read as follows:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, August 24, 1888.

Resolved, That the House concur in the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 1661) for the erection of an appraisers' warehouse in the city of New York, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on concurring in the report of the committee of conference.

The report was concurred in.

REPORT OF A COMMITTEE.

Mr. HAMPTON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 3486) for the relief of the State of South Carolina, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 8074) to provide for allotment of land in severalty to the United Peorias and Miamis in Indian Territory, it agreed to the conference asked by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. ALLEN of Mississippi, Mr. COBB, and Mr. PERKINS managers at the conference on the part of the House.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate as in Committee of the Whole resumes the consideration of the unfinished business, being Senate bill No. 12, the title of which will be reported by the Secretary.

The SECRETARY. "A bill (S. 12) to provide for the formation and admission into the Union of the State of Washington, and for other purposes."

Mr. GEORGE. I should like to know if it is the understanding that I am entitled to the floor on Monday morning on the question of referring the message of the President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The unfinished business has been laid before the Senate and will be the regular order at 2 o'clock, being the bill to admit the Territory of Washington as a State. The Senator from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] was interrupted in the midst of a speech yesterday afternoon by a motion to adjourn, which prevailed. He would properly have been entitled to the floor this morning to finish his remarks, but the debate upon the motion to refer the President's message continued by unanimous consent and without interruption until the present time.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I desire to state that it is my wish to take up the resolutions reported from the Committee on the Judiciary, which were before the Senate yesterday and on which I commenced my remarks, after the morning business on Monday, in order that I may conclude my observations on those resolutions.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion to refer the message of the President of the United States to the Committee on Foreign Relations will not be resumed on Monday except by the affirmative action of the Senate.

Mr. CULLOM. I renew my motion that the Senate do now adjourn.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Illinois.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 38 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Monday, August 27, 1888, at 12 o'clock m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, August 24, 1888.

The House was called to order at 12 o'clock m. by Mr. CRISP, as Speaker pro tempore, who directed the reading of the following communication:

SPEAKER'S ROOM, HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., August 24, 1888.

SIR: Hon. C. F. CRISP is designated to preside at the session of the House today as Speaker pro tempore.

J. G. CARLISLE, Speaker.

Hon. JOHN B. CLARK,
Clerk House of Representatives.

Prayer by Rev. J. H. CUTHBERT, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

UNITED PEORIAS AND MIAMIES.

The SPEAKER pro tempore laid before the House the bill (H. R. 8074) to provide for the allotment of lands in severalty to the United Peorias and Miamies in the Indian Territory with Senate amendments.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the Senate amendments be non-concurred in, and that the conference asked for be agreed to. I would say in explanation that this bill provides for the allotment of lands in severalty to the United Peorias and Miamies in the Indian Territory. The bill in the first instance authorized the sale of land in excess of 260 acres, and that provision has been stricken out by the Senate, and it confines the allotment to 200 acres and provides that the excess shall be held for them. Then it also strikes from the original bill the proviso which authorizes the sale of the land which the Indians owned in Kansas. It has been found that these lands were sold and that there is no necessity for that provision, and we ask that the amendments be non-concurred in and the conference agreed to.

Mr. ADAMS. That was the reason that I objected to it before.

Mr. HOOKER. I call for the reading of the amendments.

The Clerk proceeded to read the amendments.

Mr. HOOKER. I ask now that the further reading be dispensed with. Does it require unanimous consent to consider this at this time?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It does.

Mr. HOOKER. Then I object.

Mr. PERKINS. I hope the gentleman will withdraw the objection. I would like to say that the bill as it passed the House had the unanimous report of the Committee on Indian Affairs. It does not provide for the sale of any of this land; it does not open it to settlement, and does not take it out of the possession of the Indians. The Indians had a delegation here asking for this legislation; it is recommended by the Interior Department. The House committee have reported unanimously in its favor, and I do hope that there will be no objection. The chairman of the committee [Mr. PEEL] will be appointed one of the conferees.

Mr. HOOKER. Do you move to non-concur in the Senate amendments?

Mr. PERKINS. That is the motion that I make.

Mr. HOOKER. Then I will withdraw my objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The request is that the House non-concur in the Senate amendments and agree to the conference asked. Is there objection. The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

SUPPRESSION OF INFECTION.

The SPEAKER pro tempore also laid before the House the joint resolution (S. R. 102) appropriating $200,000 to suppress infection in the interstate commerce of the United States.

Mr. HOOKER. I ask, in reference to the resolution which has just been read by the Clerk, whether it is in order to consider it now?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It would not be except by unanimous consent.

Mr. HOOKER. I was about to ask unanimous consent for its consideration, but my friend from Florida [Mr. DAVIDSON] says that he desires to propose an amendment. I do not make the request.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The resolution will be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. DAVIDSON, of Florida. I ask that the Committee on Appropriations have leave to report at any time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Florida asks unanimous consent that the Committee on Appropriations have leave to report at any time upon the joint resolution which has just been referred to that committee. The title will be again read by the Clerk.

Mr. MORRILL. Have not the Committee on Appropriations the right to report at any time?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. On general appropriation bills they have, but perhaps not on matters of this character.

The Clerk again reported the title.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. WILSON, of West Virginia, for one week, on account of important business.

To Mr. MCKINNEY, indefinitely, on account of sickness.

To Mr. ALLEN, of Massachusetts, indefinitely, on account of sickness.

To Mr. CAMPBELL, of Ohio, for ten days.

To Mr. BUTTERWORTH, for six days, on account of important business.

To Mr. THOMAS H. B. BROWNE, for five days, on account of business.

APPRAISERS' WAREHOUSE, NEW YORK.

Mr. DIBBLE. Mr. Speaker, I desire to present a conference report.

The report was read, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill of the House (1661) for the erection of an appraisers' warehouse in the city of New York, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 2, 3, 4, 6, and 7, and agree to the same with the following amendment: In lines 17 and 18 of the first page, strike out the words "seven hundred" and insert "six hundred and fifty;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 5, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out the word "three" in said amendment and insert "two" in lieu thereof; and the Senate agree to the same.

SAMUEL DIBBLE,
S. S. COX,
Managers on the part of the House.

JOHN C. SPOONER,
WM. M. EVARTS,
JOHN W. DANIEL,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

The conferees on the part of the House submitted the following statement:

The managers on the part of the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. 1661) for the erection of an appraisers' warehouse in the city of New York, and for other purposes, respectfully submit the following statement with the conference report, for the information of the House:

All of the Senate amendments except the fifth simply add words providing for acquiring a site by condemnation as well as by purchase, and to these the House agree, with an amendment changing $700,000 as the limit for the building to $650,000, elsewhere provided in the bill for building.

The fifth Senate amendment will be understood from the following explanation: The bill provides for the purchase of a site not to exceed in cost $850,000, and the erection of an appraisers' warehouse thereon, not to exceed in cost $650,000, and the House and Senate have not disagreed on this, but the bill also provides that the Secretary of the Treasury shall have the discretion to purchase a site large enough to embrace a custom-house building also, as well as an appraisers' warehouse, or two sites near each other, for these two purposes, instead of a site for an appraisers' warehouse only; and in this contingency the House bill fixed a limit of $1,500,000 for the cost of such double site or sites, and the Senate increased this limit to $3,000,000. The conference report recommends $2,000,000, the House conceding $500,000 and the Senate conceding $1,000,000 in order to an agreement.

SAMUEL DIBBLE,
S. S. COX,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. DIBBLE. Mr. Speaker, unless some gentleman desires some additional information on this subject or desires to discuss this report, I move its adoption.

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to inquire of the gentleman whether there is not an entirely new item in the bill which has not been considered by the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. DIBBLE. There is no new item in the bill that I know of which has not been considered by the Committee of the Whole. There was a clerical error in the bill where in one place it prescribed that the cost of the appraisers' warehouse should not exceed $650,000, and in the next sentence said that the plans for it should not exceed an estimate of $700,000. We corrected that latter amount by bringing it down to $650,000. The part of the bill relating to the appraisers' warehouse—$850,000 for the site and $650,000 for the building—has been agreed upon by both Houses, and also some amendments in relation to putting in words of condemnation as well as of purchase. The other part of the bill, giving the Secretary discretion to purchase a double site so as to put the custom-house near the appraisers' warehouse, which is generally regarded as desirable or necessary, was in the House bill and was considered in Committee of the Whole, and the House fixed the limit for the purchase of such a site at $1,500,000.

Mr. BLOUNT. A double site?

Mr. DIBBLE. A double site; that is, in case the Secretary thinks that it is better than to put the building on the single site, which is provided for, and the provision for which has passed both Houses regularly. That has all been considered in Committee of the Whole, and the House in Committee of the Whole fixed the limit for the purchase of that double site at $1,500,000. The only change made in the Senate was as to the amount. They put it at $3,000,000. We had two conferences on it. At the second conference the House committee and the Senate committee agreed on the amount of $2,000,000, the House committee going up $500,000 and the other committee coming down $1,000,000. That is, in case the Secretary, instead of buying the site the price of which is limited to $850,000, and putting up simply the appraisers' warehouse, should think it better to have the custom-house and the warehouse at the same place, then he is given the right to pay for the site for both buildings as much as $2,000,000, which is half a million higher than the House limit and a million lower than the Senate limit. There is no provision in the bill that was not considered in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr.

DIBBLE] will explain to the House the condition of affairs in New York City in regard to the custom-house and the appraisers' office, as to the land which is owned by the Government as well as the buildings.

Mr. DIBBLE. I will proceed to do that; and what I shall say in regard to it is the result of an investigation made by a subcommittee of the Forty-ninth Congress, so that I know the situation from personal inspection and from consultation with the officers there. The appraisers' warehouse in New York, as was stated to the House when this bill was passed, and which it may be well to recall to gentlemen's minds at this time, is an old building, badly arranged and poorly adapted to the purposes for which it is used. It was formerly either a soap factory or a sugar refinery, and we were told by the officials that it was very difficult to inspect and appraise fine goods there without their getting damaged.

The accommodations are so poor that sometimes when goods are brought there it takes several hours before they can be unloaded; so that they may not get through the appraisement until the day after.

I do not suppose there is anywhere in the whole country greater need for a public building of this character. The business transacted there affects the whole country. Because of the large proportion of imports coming into New York, there is no case where there is such need as in the city of New York of the Government owning its appraisers' warehouse. At present the Government occupies rented property under a lease which will expire, I think, next year—certainly by the year after. The rent paid by the Government is $64,000 per annum, which at 3 per cent. is the interest on an investment of over $2,000,000. This rent has been going on for some time, and every time the lease runs out there is an increase in the amount paid.

Mr. BLOUNT. Does this bill appropriate money or simply authorize——

Mr. DIBBLE. It appropriates the money. In that form it passed the House and the Senate. I am speaking now as to the appraisers' warehouse. That is not now in conference. That part of the matter of which I am speaking has been agreed upon by both Houses.

Mr. BLAND. I understood that the bill, as passed by the House, authorized the sale of certain property.

Mr. DIBBLE. It did not. There was no property to be sold, because the appraisers' warehouse is rented property. The matter in regard to the purchase of ground sufficient for the custom-house as well as the appraisers' warehouse being left to the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury, it may become necessary to provide for the sale of the custom-house property, because, if the interests of the Government required provision for another custom-house, it would be necessary to sell the present property and buy a new site.

As to the present custom-house, I will say that we went through it and inspected it thoroughly. We saw the collector of the port, and went through the different departments. We visited the place during working hours and saw how business goes on day by day. We talked with importers in relation to the matter. That custom-house has not to-day sufficient capacity for the public business. A large portion of adjacent property is now rented for some of the offices, and a bridge has been carried across the street to connect the annex. Still there is general complaint of insufficient accommodations for business; and by the crowd in the general office, where business with the merchants is directly attended to, we saw that there were not such accommodations as the public business requires. Merchants are sometimes delayed twenty-four hours in the transaction of their business. There certainly ought to be enlarged accommodations for the custom-house. And it is the opinion of the collector of the port that the custom-house should be near the appraisers' warehouse.

The distance between these two establishments is now a mile and a half. The appraisers' warehouse is in that section of the city where the steamers land which bring importations; and the importing business has accommodated itself to this location, the appraisers' store being now rather intermediate between where the goods land and where the importers' warehouses are. The custom-house, however, is a mile down town. Papers have to be sent back and forth between the collector and the appraiser by messenger; and sometimes the time thus lost occasions a delay of twenty-four hours to business men. It is the general opinion that these two establishments of the Government should be near each other. Hence, while providing for an appraisers' warehouse, we also, after consultation with the Secretary of the Treasury, put in this clause, giving him authority to buy ground which would provide for both.

Mr. HOLMAN. That is a new feature in the bill?

Mr. DIBBLE. No, that was in the bill of last session.

Mr. HOLMAN. I mean it is new in the bill as passed by the House.

Mr. DIBBLE. No, sir; it was in the bill as introduced last session; it was also in the bill introduced by the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] at this session, and it was in the bill as reported.

Mr. BLAND. I understood the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] to claim that under the bill property owned by the Government would be sold and the proceeds of the sale would pay the expense of a new building.

Mr. DIBBLE. I will go on and explain that matter. If the Secretary of the Treasury should adopt the course about which there is now no difference between the two Houses, both having already agreed upon that point, that is, if a square of ground be purchased and an appraisers' warehouse simply be erected thereon, then there will be no sale of Government property at all, because the present appraisers' warehouse is a rented building, and the custom-house will remain where it is. But if the Secretary of the Treasury should come to the conclusion that it would be better to buy a site large enough for the appraisers' warehouse and custom-house both, then, of course, as soon as the new custom-house accommodations are completed the present custom-house with its site could be and would be sold. The gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] stated the other day (and I think that is the subject to which the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND] alludes in his question) that in his judgment, on account of the situation of this property, the present site being in Wall street where property is exceedingly valuable, the old site in that location would bring, if sold, about three million of dollars, which amount would pay for this double site entirely, and would then leave a million of dollars over to put up a new custom-house, which ought to complete it.

And if the double site was purchased, of course it would involve in future the sale of the present custom-house property. There is no section of the city of New York, as I am informed by those who are familiar with the subject, where land commands as high prices as on Wall street owing to the consolidation of great business interests there, and therefore the land which is proposed for the new appraisers' warehouse and custom-house combined, in case both should be built, could be bought at a much cheaper figure than the old site would bring.

The Government paid many years ago for the present custom-house site—it was the old Merchants' Exchange Building which is used for that purpose—I think, a million dollars, at a time when property was considerably lower than it is now; because it is estimated by those who know the facts that this site alone has increased in value to such an extent as to be worth $3,000,000, in consequence, as I have said, of the concentration of great business interests in that immediate neighborhood. Of course, property in other parts of the city would not be so high, and a less sum than that for which this could be sold would purchase the double site for the custom house and appraisers' ware-house, in the opinion of the House committee.

We put it into the bill two years ago at one and a half million dollars. Mr. COX introduced the bill in that shape, and we so reported it back. The Senate Committee said that in their opinion it would take $3,000,000 to purchase a double site for both buildings; but we did not agree on that, and finally fixed the maximum as here embodied at $2,000,000.

Mr. HOLMAN. What are the two buildings to cost, the appraisers' warehouse and the custom-house, provided the custom-house is to be built?

Mr. DIBBLE. It is provided that the appraisers' warehouse shall not cost over $650,000; and that amount is fixed in accordance with estimates obtained from the Architect's Office, which show that that amount will be sufficient.

It is also provided that it is to be a plain brick building, without porticos or needless ornamentation, but shall be constructed at the same time specially with a view to the convenience of the transaction of that particular business. So that it will be an economically-constructed establishment, designed expressly for the purpose to which it is to be applied. That amount is fixed in the event of the purchase of a single or a double site. In either event that amount will be applied to the construction of this building; but there is no provision, I will say to the gentleman from Indiana, or anything said about the erection of a custom-house building, or the sale of the present custom-house property. In case the Secretary of the Treasury should purchase a double site, it would be for Congress to determine how much the custom-house building should cost, and also provide, I suppose, when this new building, if it is constructed at all, shall be finished and ready for occupancy, that the present site and building should be sold. I have already stated the opinions of those who know as to its value.

In this matter we did not act—those of us who went to New York and looked into the matter—upon our own judgment alone, but we invited a conference with every member then representing New York; and Mr. Hewitt, of New York, was kind enough to spend a half a day with us on our inspection and gave us very many valuable suggestions and much useful information, which assisted materially in framing the original bill on which this report is founded. The Secretary of the Treasury was also consulted in relation to the matter.

It is, in my judgment, absolutely necessary in the first instance that we should have an appraisers' warehouse; and the price fixed, according to the ascertained facts in New York, are for the building $650,000 and for the site $850,000. That part of the plan is already established. It is also a matter of economy, I think, to the Government that the Secretary of the Treasury should not be tied to that plan alone, if he finds on an examination of the subject that he can buy the double site at a reasonable price, which will facilitate the customs business of the Government, and erect the building within a reasonable limit. But, in the opinion of the committee, the sale of the old custom-house site will certainly bring more money than the site for both the new buildings will cost. Then, of course, provision will be made for building a custom-house. It is about as economical a disposition of the matter, which is of great interest to the country, as could possibly be made in the opinion of the committee.

I yield now ten minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT].

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Speaker, my object in taking the floor at this time is not specially for the purpose of opposing this report, but to call attention to what I deem to be a serious error beginning to take firm hold upon this House. We have witnessed recently a struggle between two of the committees of this House in reference to jurisdiction over appropriations, which struggle it is hoped has been finally and well disposed of. We likewise have on one of the general appropriation bills a provision for the payment of a vast number of claims exceptional in their character and contrary to the ordinary mode of procedure here.

Now, sir, we have a conference report from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds on a bill reported from that committee, which committee is charged under the rules of the House with the consideration of bills authorizing the construction of public buildings throughout the country. We have in it not only the exercise of the authority to construct the building, but to appropriate the money necessary for that purpose, and it is now proposed under a conference report to appropriate $2,000,000 for that purpose in the present instance.

Under the rules of this House the appropriations for public buildings belong to the Committee on Appropriations, and are provided for in the sundry civil bill of the bills committed to them. The appropriations under the rules are distinctly committed with certain exceptions—postal, Navy, etc.—to the Committee on Appropriations, and wisely. There should be one committee in this House charged with the examination of the expenditures of the Government, having the subject-matter in view, of having the right to examine and regulate them accordingly. Now, I undertake to say that there is no member in this House who can say at this time what are the expenditures for public buildings. I had occasion when one of these bills was before the House to inquire whether any appropriations were contained in it, and I was assured that there were none. I have been assured on more than one occasion that the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds were not reporting bills with appropriations. Here, sir, is a single item of $2,000,000 that the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds have no more right to consider than the Committee on Manufactures.

Mr. HOLMAN. It is $2,650,000.

Mr. DIBBLE. The House bill was $1,500,000; but this is the conference report.

Mr. HOLMAN. It makes the amount $2,650,000.

Mr. DIBBLE. The House bill carried really a million and a half.

Mr. HOLMAN. If the Secretary of the Interior thinks proper to purchase the double site——

Mr. DIBBLE. It would go to $2,150,000.

Mr. HOLMAN. By the action of the Senate, if agreed to by the House, this bill will involve $2,650,000.

Mr. DIBBLE. That will be the action on the conference report; that is not the subject to which I understood the gentleman from Georgia to be taking exception, but to the action of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds reporting appropriations. It is out of the hands of the committee, and is in conference.

Mr. BLOUNT. I concede that; and I stated that my objection was not so much to oppose this specific matter as to suggest that it is entering upon a grave error of sufficient importance to call to the attention of the House. While this is the conference report, I understand from the observations of the gentleman from South Carolina the original House bill provided an appropriation of a million and a half dollars.

Mr. DIBBLE. That is my impression. I have sent for the bill.

Mr. BLOUNT. The point I make, Mr. Speaker, is that they have no right to recommend any appropriations at all.

In the history of the rules of this House it appears from the RECORD that an ay-and-no vote was taken as to whether the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds should have authority to recommend appropriations, and it was distinctly voted down.

Mr. DIBBLE. Will my friend from Georgia say when that was?

Mr. HOLMAN. At the beginning of the Forty-ninth Congress.

Mr. BLOUNT. My friend from Indiana says at the beginning of the Forty-ninth Congress. My impression was it occurred at the beginning of the Forty-eighth Congress.

Mr. DIBBLE. I think it is further back than that, as it has not been done since I have been here.

Mr. BLOUNT. No matter how far it is back, it is true that from that time until this every succeeding House has refused to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds the right to recommend appropriations to the House. I find, contrary to these rules, this committee are bringing in these recommendations that belong to the Committee on Appropriations, and it is a matter which the House eo nomine committed to that committee.

Mr. HOLMAN. It is almost impossible to ascertain the public expenses at any one time on that point.

Mr. BLOUNT. As my friend from Indiana has stated it is almost impossible to ascertain the expenditures for public buildings at any one time. If you take up the sundry civil bill, which provides moneys under the rules of the House for the construction of public buildings, to ascertain the amount therein contained a superficial observer would think that would indicate the expenditures had been kept within a given amount. If he should follow closely the legislation on public buildings he will find that there are a great many additional amounts; here in one single instance is an appropriation of a million and a half in violation of the rules of the House. Now, Mr. Speaker, we have been on a series of measures: first, a contest between two committees of this House as to fortifications; second, a contest now pending as to the payment of claims on appropriation bills, and here is a matter of $2,000,000 reported and in the hands of a conference who have no responsibility to this House on the subject of expenditures.

Mr. Speaker, my sole purpose has been accomplished if members of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds in this matter of appropriations for public buildings shall conform to what I believe is the right course in the matter of appropriations.

Mr. DIBBLE. Mr. Speaker, the rule of the House is that the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds is to have jurisdiction of matters relating to the public improved and unimproved grounds of the United States other than appropriations therefor.

But, Mr. Speaker, in this instance the bill came to us with a provision for an appropriation in it, and as it was a case of extreme urgency, we reported it in that form. And so far as that is concerned I am rather inclined to believe that when the House refers a matter to us it authorizes us to report back the matter which it refers, with our opinion as to whether it ought or ought not to pass. It is not always the case that the House refers a matter to the committee prescribed in the rules, and when the House by its order of reference sends to us a bill which provides, as some of these bills do, an appropriation of so much money in increase of a limit, in such cases we examine the bill and report it back; but our usual form of bill has no appropriation in it. Now, conceding all the gentleman has said about the rules of the House, I maintain that there is no more vicious rule in relation to economy in the transaction of the public business than the very rule which the gentleman seeks to have enforced. It has been frequently the case in my observation since I have had the honor to be a member of this House that that rule has worked against economy.

At the present session of Congress, in the interest of economy, I introduced a proposition, which was sent to the Committee on Rules, that our committee should be put on the same footing as, if you please, the Post-Office Committee, of which my friend from Georgia is chairman, stands with reference to Post-Office appropriations, or that we should be put on the same footing as the Committee on Rivers and Harbors with reference to appropriations for rivers and harbors (which also are a matter of public improvement); and it would be in the interest of economy that that proposition should be adopted, for this reason: If a limit is fixed at the time the bill is passed and an appropriation up to that limit is made, so as to render the fund available, it enables contracts to be made on a large scale instead of splitting the building up into a lot of little contracts, a method which greatly increases the expense. The plan I propose would enable contracts to be made for the entire work, and in that way, I am assured by the Supervising Architect and by those who are experienced in building, large amounts of money could be saved which under the present system of piecemeal appropriations are lost.

Mr. BLOUNT. Will the gentleman permit a question for information?

Mr. DIBBLE. Yes, sir.

Mr. BLOUNT. The gentleman says that some bills are reported by his committee containing appropriations and some without. I wish to ask him how much money has been appropriated by bills originating with the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and about how many instances there have been of that kind?

Mr. DIBBLE. I am unable to state that, but they are exceptional. We have a form of bill, and when members consult any member of the committee or come to the committee-room and consult the committee in advance of introducing a bill, we furnish them a blank form which conforms strictly and rigidly to the rule of the House, and of course contains no appropriation. But in some instances, which are exceptional—I can not state the number or the amount, but they are exceptional cases—we have reported appropriations.

If a measure of emergency came to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds now, at this late stage of the session, when the appropriation bills have passed from the hands of the Committee on Appropriations, we should probably, in accordance with our custom, report it back to the House; because otherwise there might be a failure of appropriation and a delay of the work. But, as I have said, these cases are exceptional. I have been speaking as to what ought to be the rule, and I say that in the interest of economy the best way would be to have the committee which investigates and fixes the limit have charge of the appropriation also. In the last Congress I had occasion to go back and search through the appropriations that had been made under the old system and under the present system, and I found it to be the case that in some instances, as the result of the practice of these piecemeal appropriations, when a building had progressed so far as to come within, say, $25,000 of exhausting its limit, the Committee on Appropriations, through inadvertence, would give it perhaps $70,000, and in that way exceed the limit by $50,000; whereas if all the money had been appropriated at the beginning the building would probably have been constructed within the limit. The instances are numerous—I do not know but they amounted to a majority of the cases at the time of that investigation, two or three years ago—in which the Committee on Appropriations, under this piecemeal system, gave a building an amount over and above the limit that had been fixed. The appropriation has always been held by the executive department to amount to a repeal of the limit to the extent of the appropriation, and in all such cases these excessive appropriations have been used, a thing which would not have been possible if in the first instance the appropriation had been in the same hands which fixed the limit. That is one feature.

Again, in one or two instances, under this divided system, appropriations have been made which Congress did not really contemplate at all. If I had by me my notes of that investigation I could cite instances.

I have always contended since I have had any understanding of this subject that when the House is considering the question of a public building the proper plan is to take up the question as a whole and dispose of it in that way; and that we should, in providing for the building, appropriate the money. I grant that in case of a large appropriation which can not be expended at once, there might be an appropriation of a certain amount to be available this year, a certain amount next year, and so on. But if the course which I have suggested were adopted there would not be creeping in the appropriation bills and passing without question amounts of fifty, seventy-five, or one hundred thousand dollars for this or that public building—amounts in many instances in excess of the original limit. Therefore, I say that the rule now followed by the House is not the best, although the committee of which I have the honor to be chairman has observed that rule with a very few exceptions, which we thought were justified by the fact that the bills came to us with appropriations in them, and the cases were matters of immediate urgency or exigency. I think the case now before us is such a case. It ought to have been provided for long ago. There is need this very day of this appraisers' warehouse in the city of New York. This is a case which ought to be made an exception to the general rule.

The gentleman having said that our committee has no jurisdiction over appropriations, I will say that we have never inserted an appropriation in a bill which has come to us without an appropriation. A great many bills reported by us with appropriations in them have been Senate bills which have invariably come over to us in that form. In such cases we report the bills back with or without amendment, as the case may be. In other cases where we have reported bills containing appropriations, the House has referred the bills with the appropriation clause in; and we have left it in. The committee has never itself inserted an appropriation in a bill, within my recollection. The form of bill which we have adopted does not contain the appropriation clause. At the same time we consider that the rule adopted by the House is a bad one for economy. We can see that its operation every day is to open an easy way for getting beyond the limits imposed by the House, the appropriations being obtained from another committee, and sometimes, no doubt, granted inadvertently. In the multiplicity of cases, it is a hard thing to go back in every instance and count up the little piecemeal appropriations year after year, sifting them out from different bills. In that way appropriations in excess of the limits imposed creep in sometimes by inadvertence. If we had the power of appropriation in every instance this could not happen, because if an increase of appropriation were asked for bona fide meritorious reasons, the matter would be referred to us, we would investigate it, and submit the facts to the House; and the House would take it up as an independent proposition, which is not done now, these appropriations being usually passed wholesale in a general appropriation bill.

Now, Mr. Speaker, unless some gentleman wishes to address the House in relation to this subject, I will ask the previous question on the adoption of the report.

The previous question was ordered; and under the operation thereof the report was agreed to, there being—ayes 30, noes 19.

Mr. DIBBLE moved to reconsider the vote by which the report was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

APPROACHES TO NATIONAL CEMETERY, SALISBURY, N. C.

Mr. HENDERSON, of North Carolina. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole House be discharged from the further consideration of the bill which I send to the desk, and that it be now considered and passed.

The bill (H. R. 10187) to provide for grading and paving the approaches to the national cemetery near Salisbury, N. C., was read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. BLAND. Let us have the report read.

The report was read.

Mr. BLAND. I hardly think it proper for Congress to go into the work of grading and improving the roads to all these various cemeteries. There is a little cemetery near my town in regard to which I would like to have a measure of this kind passed. In a great many other localities the people would like to have the Federal Government improve the roads to these national cemeteries. I believe I must object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Objection being made, the bill is not before the House.

ADDIE BELL.

Mr. NUTTING. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 1506) for the relief of Addie Bell.

Mr. BLAND. I call for the regular order.

Mr. NUTTING. I hope the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND] will withdraw that demand for a moment, so that I may state what this bill is. If he will listen to a brief statement I think he will not object to the bill.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular order is demanded. This being Friday, the regular order is the call of committees for reports of a private nature.

Mr. BURNES. I move to dispense with private business for this day.

Mr. GALLINGER. With the understanding that members may file reports with the Clerk.

Mr. BURNES. Yes, sir.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Missouri, pending the motion to dispense with private business, asks unanimous consent that members be allowed to file reports with the Clerk for appropriate reference. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

FILING OF REPORTS.

The following reports were filed by being handed in at the Clerk's desk:

MARY A. HOLLAND.

Mr. GALLINGER, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 10874) granting a pension to Mary A. Holland; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

MARTHA GIDDING.

Mr. GALLINGER also, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 4101) granting a pension to Martha Gidding, formerly Martha Priest; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

JOHN V. HENNESSEY.

Mr. GALLINGER also, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back favorably the bill (S. 2321) granting a pension to John V. Hennessey; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

NELSON J. CROOK.

Mr. WALKER, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 3801) granting a pension to Nelson J. Crook; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

LEAMAN L. BOWERS.

Mr. WALKER also, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 10433) for the relief of Leaman L. Bowers; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ADVERSE REPORTS.

Mr. WALKER also, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back adversely bills of the following titles; which were severally referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and the accompaning reports ordered to be printed:

A bill (H. R. 3802) granting a pension to William J. Scarborough;
A bill (H. R. 425) granting a pension to Elisha L. Elam;
A bill (H. R. 4888) granting a pension to F. E. H. Biller; and
A bill (H. R. 2616) granting arrears of pension to W. J. McGlade.

JOHN W. ELLIS.

Mr. HUNTER, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 10094) granting a pension to John W.

Ellis; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ANN E. MUSSMAN.

Mr. MATSON, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 2157) granting a pension to Ann E. Mussman; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

CHRISTINA LESSITT.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, informed the House that the Senate had passed, with an amendment in which the concurrence of the House was requested, a joint resolution (H. Res. 201) to correct an error in the act making an appropriation for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1889, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed a bill (S. 3276) granting a restoration of pension to Sarah A. Woodbridge; in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

LANDS FOR PEORIA AND MIAMI INDIANS.

The SPEAKER pro tempore appointed as conferees on the part of the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. 8074) to provide for allotment of lands in severalty to United Peorias and Miamis in the Indian Territory Mr. ALLEN of Mississippi, Mr. COBB, and Mr. PERKINS.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is now on the motion of the gentleman of Missouri [Mr. BURNES] to dispense with the consideration of private business for this day.

Mr. PERKINS. I presume the gentleman from Missouri would not object to the consideration of private business after we dispose of the deficiency appropriation bill, if we should do so in a short time.

Mr. BURNES. Certainly not.

Mr. PERKINS. I understand the gentleman's object is simply to go into Committee of the Whole to dispose of that bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The motion of the gentleman from Missouri is to dispense with the consideration of private business, with the understanding that when the deficiency bill shall have been disposed of, private business may be entered upon.

The motion was agreed to.

DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BURNES. I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of resuming the consideration of the bill (H. R. 10896) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1888, and prior years, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. SPRINGER in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. When the committee rose it was dividing by tellers on the question whether the appeal from the decision of the Chair should stand as the judgment of the committee. The tellers will resume their places and the vote will be again taken.

Mr. DIBBLE. Is not the question whether the fourth section, embracing the French spoliation claims, is in order on this bill?

Mr. HOLMAN. The question is whether or not the decision of the Chair shall be sustained.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair held that the several paragraphs of section 4 were not in order on this bill. From that decision the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. DIBBLE] appealed. The question is, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the committee? The tellers [Mr. BURNES and Mr. DIBBLE] will resume their places and the vote will again be taken.

The committee proceeded to divide.

Before the announcement of the result of the division—

Mr. HOLMAN. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HOLMAN. Is it not understood that a quorum has been called on this vote, the point of order being made that no quorum voted? That being the case is it not a fact that gentlemen who are paired are, under the general rules of pairing, permitted to vote in order to make a quorum? I would like the views of the Chairman upon that point.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of no quorum has not been made, the result of the vote by tellers not as yet being announced.

Mr. DIBBLE. Mr. Chairman, gentlemen on both sides of the House have been voting, notwithstanding the pairs, under the impression that the point of no quorum was a pending point.

Mr. DUNN. I ask the Chair to announce the result of the vote by tellers.

The CHAIRMAN. For the purpose of ascertaining if the demand for a quorum will be made, the Chair will announce the result as reported by the tellers.

The result was announced as—ayes 82, noes 62.

Mr. DIBBLE. That is not a quorum, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order being made that no quorum has voted, the tellers will resume their places and continue the count.

Mr. DUNN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to call the attention of the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. DIBBLE] to the fact that 82 is a majority of a quorum, and that it is impossible for him to defeat it; and therefore further proceedings will simply delay the business of the House.

Mr. DIBBLE. I have simply this to say, Mr. Chairman, in response to the matter of arithmetic so kindly suggested by my friend from Arkansas, and which I realize—that I consider that the proposition which I have maintained in the course of the debate on this question, and which I maintain now, has been sustained by a vote on this floor of a majority of all the members of the House—163 members sustaining me on a yea-and-nay vote.

Mr. BURNES. Mr. Chairman, I beg leave to deny that any yea-and-nay vote was taken upon this proposition.

Mr. DIBBLE. And owing to the absence of many of the members of the House——

Mr. PAYSON and Mr. BURNES demanded the regular order.

Mr. DIBBLE. I am perfectly willing to proceed with the regular order, but was only replying to what the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. DUNN] had said.

Mr. DUNN. I had not completed what I wanted to say, if the gentleman wants to reply. I was going on to remark——

Mr. DIBBLE. I believe I have the floor if any one is entitled to it.

The CHAIRMAN. The regular order being demanded neither gentleman is entitled to the floor, but the count by tellers will proceed.

Mr. ALLEN, of Mississippi. I would like a little more speech-making on this question. [Laughter.]

Mr. DIBBLE. I am ready to oblige the gentleman if the House will give me the privilege of proceeding.

The CHAIRMAN. The tellers will resume their places and continue the count.

Mr. BURNES. I am advised, Mr. Chairman, that many gentlemen are refraining from voting under the impression that this is a continuation of the vote begun on yesterday.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has stated already that this vote would be taken de novo this morning; and the Chair hopes that all gentlemen present will vote one way or the other, so that the committee will not find itself without a quorum.

Mr. DIBBLE. I rise to a question of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. DIBBLE. I am informed that the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] voted under a misapprehension, and has stated that he desires to change his vote from the affirmative to the negative.

Mr. SIMMONS. I expected to make that request myself as soon as the vote by tellers was announced. I am obliged to the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The tally clerk will take notice of the change.

Mr. DIBBLE. I ask the Chair to state the present condition of the vote.

The Chair announced the vote as—ayes 84, noes 68.

Mr. DIBBLE. As there is evidently no quorum present, I move that the usual proceedings be taken to terminate the call. I have made the point that no quorum has voted, which point I now insist upon, and ask that the roll be called.

The CHAIRMAN. The Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union having found itself without a quorum, under clause 2, of Rule XXIII, the Clerk will now call the roll.

Mr. BURNES (one of the tellers). One more vote in the affirmative.

Mr. DIBBLE (the other teller). I object to the announcement of any other votes by tellers after the statement has been made by the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. It will not change the result.

The Clerk will call the roll.

The roll was called, and the following members failed to answer to their names:

Allen, Mass.	Dalzell,	Kennedy,	Reed,

Mr. PENINGTON: The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CHIPMAN] left the House a few moments ago feeling quite unwell, and I desire to make this announcement on his behalf.

Mr. DAVIS. I desire to ask that my colleague [Mr. WHITING, of Massachusetts,] be excused on account of sickness, unless he already has leave of absence.

The CHAIRMAN. The time for making excuses will be when the roll is called in the House.

The committee will now rise, and the Clerk will report the names of the absentees to the House, to be entered upon the Journal.

Mr. LAFFOON. I would like to ask that my colleague [Mr. STONE] be excused, on account of sickness.

The CHAIRMAN. That can be done in the House.

The committee will now rise.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker pro tempore having taken the chair, Mr. SPRINGER reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, having had under consideration the bill H. R. 10896, the deficiency appropriation bill, had found itself without a quorum, whereupon he had directed the roll to be called, and now reported the names of the absentees to the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The names of the absentees will be entered upon the Journal. No quorum has answered upon the call.

Mr. BURNES. I move a call of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. COWLES. My friend and colleague, Mr. JOHNSTON, of North Carolina, is absent from the House on account of sickness.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Excuses will be in order on the second call of the roll. The Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, when the following-named members failed to answer:

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The doors will be closed and the names of absentees called for excuses.

The names of absentees were called as follows:

Mr. ALLEN, of Massachusetts: No excuse offered.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Iowa: No excuse offered.

Mr. ATKINSON: No excuse offered.

Mr. BACON: No excuse offered.

Mr. BAKER, of New York: No excuse offered.

Mr. BARRY: No excuse offered.

Mr. BELDEN: No excuse offered.

Mr. BELMONT: No excuse offered.

Mr. BIGGS: No excuse offered.

Mr. BINGHAM. No excuse offered.

Mr. BLANCHARD.

Mr. WILKINSON. I ask that my colleague, Mr. BLANCHARD, be excused on account of illness.

There was no objection.

Mr. BOUTELLE: No excuse offered.

Mr. BROWER: No excuse offered.

Mr. T. H. B. BROWNE.

Mr. YOST. My colleague, Mr. BROWNE, of Virginia, has leave of absence.

Mr. BROWN, of Ohio: No excuse offered.

Mr. BRUMM: No excuse offered.

Mr. BUCHANAN: No excuse offered.

Mr. BUCKALEW.

Mr. LYNCH. I ask that my colleague, Mr. BUCKALEW, be excused, as he is absent on account of important business.

There was no objection.

Mr. BURNETT: No excuse offered.

Mr. BURROWS: No excuse offered.

Mr. FELIX CAMPBELL: No excuse offered.

Mr. CAMPBELL, of Ohio: No excuse offered.

Mr. TIMOTHY J. CAMPBELL: No excuse offered.

Mr. CANDLER: No excuse offered.

Mr. CARLTON: No excuse offered.

Mr. CHIPMAN.

Mr. PENNINGTON. Mr. CHIPMAN was in the House an hour ago and left, as he was feeling very unwell; and I ask that he be excused.

There was no objection.

Mr. CLARDY: No excuse offered.

Mr. COCKRAN: No excuse offered.

Mr. COGSWELL: No excuse offered.

Mr. COLLINS: No excuse offered.

Mr. COOPER: No excuse offered.

Mr. COTHRAN: No excuse offered.

Mr. COX: No excuse offered.

Mr. CRAIN: No excuse offered.

Mr. CROUSE: No excuse offered.

Mr. CUMMINGS: No excuse offered.

Mr. CUTCHEON: No excuse offered.

Mr. ALLEN, of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, is it necessary and proper to render excuse for gentlemen who are absent by leave of the House?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Unless the House makes some other order it is not necessary. It is not necessary to render excuse for gentlemen who have leave of absence.

Mr. ALLEN, of Michigan. I ask that, because the RECORD makes no mention of the fact that members are absent by leave of the House in a proceeding of this kind, but there appears opposite the names of those who do not answer, "No excuse offered."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The RECORD does contain notice of the leave of absence granted to a member, but not perhaps at the particular point where there are proceedings under the call of the House.

Mr. WARNER. I would raise the question, because I find on looking at the RECORD that members who were excused by order of the House appear in the RECORD in proceedings under a call of the House with "No excuse offered" opposite their names, and nothing appears in the RECORD of that day to show that they were excused by order of the House. It seems to me that the RECORD should show that members were absent by the leave of the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair has observed that that is the practice, that although members are excused by leave of the House the roll-call shows according to the RECORD that no excuse was offered. That, however, has been the practice of compiling the record of the House and that is a practice of the propriety of which the present occupant of the chair thinks there may be some doubt.

Mr. ALLEN, of Michigan. Would it be in order to move that the RECORD should show who of those absentees had leave? I found myself in that category a few days ago, when I had been excused. I do not care to appear as one of the "foolish virgins."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The present occupant of the chair would be glad that that question might be made at some time when the regular presiding officer of the House is in the chair.

Mr. DALZELL: No excuse offered.
Mr. DARGAN.
Mr. DIBBLE. I ask that my colleague, Mr. DARGAN, be excused.
There was no objection, and it was so ordered.
Mr. DARLINGTON: No excuse offered.
Mr. DAVENPORT: No excuse offered.
Mr. DE LANO: No excuse offered.
Mr. DINGLEY: No excuse offered.
Mr. DORSEY: No excuse offered.
Mr. DUNHAM: No excuse offered.
Mr. ERMENTROUT: No excuse offered.
Mr. FELTON.
Mr. MCKENNA. I ask that my colleague, Mr. FELTON, be excused. He is unavoidably absent on important business.
There was no objection.
Mr. FINLEY: No excuse offered.
Mr. FISHER: No excuse offered.
Mr. FITCH: No excuse offered.
Mr. FORD: No excuse offered.
Mr. FUNSTON: No excuse offered.
Mr. GAINES: No excuse offered.
Mr. GLOVER: No excuse offered.
Mr. GOFF: No excuse offered.

Mr. HARE: No excuse offered.
Mr. HARMER: No excuse offered.
Mr. HATCH: No excuse offered.
Mr. HAYDEN: No excuse offered.
Mr. HAYES: No excuse offered.
Mr. HEMPHILL: No excuse offered.
Mr. HOGG: No excuse offered.
Mr. HOLMES: No excuse offered.
Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois: No excuse offered.
Mr. HOPKINS, of New York: No excuse offered.
Mr. HOUK: No excuse offered.
Mr. HOWARD: No excuse offered.
Mr. HUDD: No excuse offered.
Mr. JOHNSTON, of North Carolina.
Mr. HENDERSON, of North Carolina. My colleague, Mr. JOHNSTON, is absent on account of sickness, and I ask that he be excused.
There was no objection.
Mr. KELLEY: No excuse offered.
Mr. KENNEDY: No excuse offered.
Mr. LAGAN: No excuse offered.
Mr. LANDES: No excuse offered.
Mr. LATHAM: No excuse offered.
Mr. LAWLER: No excuse offered.
Mr. LONG: No excuse offered.
Mr. MAFFETT: No excuse offered.
Mr. MAHONEY: No excuse offered.
Mr. MASON: No excuse offered.
Mr. MCADOO.
Mr. KEAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that my colleague, Mr. MCADOO, who is out of the city on business, be excused.
There was no objection, and it was so ordered.
Mr. MCCLAMMY: No excuse offered.
Mr. MCCOMAS: No excuse offered.
Mr. MCCULLOGH: No excuse offered.
Mr. MCKINLEY: No excuse offered.
Mr. MCKINNEY: No excuse offered.
Mr. MCMILLIN: No excuse offered.

Mr. MILLIKEN: No excuse offered.
Mr. MILLS: No excuse offered.
Mr. MOFFITT: No excuse offered.
Mr. MONTGOMERY: No excuse offered.
Mr. MORROW: No excuse offered.
Mr. MORSE: No excuse offered.
Mr. NORWOOD: No excuse offered.
Mr. OATES.
Mr. COBB. I desire to say that my colleague, Mr. OATES, is absent on duty for the House.
Mr. O'DONNELL: No excuse offered.
Mr. O'FERRALL.
Mr. WISE. My colleague, Mr. O'FERRALL, is absent on account of important business. I ask that he be excused.
There was no objection.
Mr. OUTHWAITE: No excuse offered.
Mr. OWEN: No excuse offered.
Mr. PATTON: No excuse offered.
Mr. PEEL.
Mr. DUNN. Mr. Speaker, my colleague, Mr. PEEL, is absent by leave of the House. Is it necessary to ask that he be excused?
The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is not.
Mr. PERRY: No excuse offered.
Mr. PHELPS.
Mr. KEAN. I ask that my colleague be excused on account of important business.
There was no objection.
Mr. PIDCOCK: No excuse offered.
Mr. PLUMB: No excuse offered.
Mr. PUGSLEY: No excuse offered.
Mr. RANDALL: No excuse offered.
Mr. RAYNER: No excuse offered.
Mr. REED: No excuse offered.
Mr. RICE: No excuse offered.
Mr. ROBERTSON.
Mr. WILKINSON. My colleague, Mr. ROBERTSON, is absent on leave.
Mr. ROWELL: No excuse offered.
Mr. RUSSELL, of Connecticut: No excuse offered.
Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts: No excuse offered.
Mr. RUSK: No excuse offered.
Mr. RYAN: No excuse offered.
Mr. SCOTT: No excuse offered.
Mr. SEYMOUR: No excuse offered.
Mr. SHAW: No excuse offered.
Mr. SHIVELY: No excuse offered.
Mr. SIMMONS: No excuse offered.
Mr. SNYDER: No excuse offered.
Mr. SOWDEN.
Mr. SAYERS. Mr. SOWDEN'S wife has been quite unwell for ten or fifteen days, and on Wednesday he left to take her home to Pennsylvania. I therefore ask that he be excused.
There was no objection.
Mr. SPINOLA: No excuse offered.
Mr. SPOONER: No excuse offered.
Mr. STEPHENSON: No excuse offered.
Mr. STEWART, of Texas: No excuse offered.
Mr. STEWART, of Georgia: No excuse offered.
Mr. STONE, of Kentucky.
Mr. LAFFOON. I ask that my colleague, Mr. STONE, be excused on account of sickness.
There was no objection.
Mr. TAULBEE.
Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. My colleague, Mr. TAULBEE, was suddenly called home by illness in his family on last Sabbath, and I ask that he be excused.
There was no objection.
Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR: No excuse offered.
Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR: No excuse offered.
Mr. THOMAS, of Kentucky: No excuse offered.
Mr. THOMAS, of Illinois: No excuse offered.
Mr. TILLMAN: No excuse offered.

Mr. WEST: No excuse offered.
Mr. WHITE, of New York: No excuse offered.
Mr. WHITING, of Michigan: No excuse offered.
Mr. WHITING, of Massachusetts.
Mr. DAVIS. I ask that my colleague, Mr. WHITING, be excused on account of illness.
There was no objection.
Mr. WICKHAM.
Mr. ROMEIS. I ask that my colleague, Mr. WICKHAM, be excused on account of sickness.
There was no objection.

Mr. WILBER: No excuse offered.
Mr. WILKINS: No excuse offered.
Mr. WILSON, of West Virginia: No excuse offered.
Mr. WOODBURN: No excuse offered.
Mr. YARDLEY.
Mr. McCORMICK. I ask that my colleague, Mr. YARDLEY, be excused on account of important business.
There was no objection.
Mr. YODER: No excuse offered.
Mr. HOVEY. I ask that my name be called.
Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. Speaker, will the names of those who are excused by the House appear in the RECORD as absent on leave?
The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under the practice of compiling the RECORD the Chair thinks that the RECORD of that day will not show the fact that members are absent on leave. It is the practice that has obtained, that those who have had previous absence will not be shown in the RECORD.
Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Then I desire to state that my colleague, Mr. CLARK, of Wisconsin, is absent with leave of the House.
The SPEAKER pro tempore. One hundred and fifty-eight gentlemen have answered when their names were called, not a quorum.
Subsequently the following-named members appeared, and under the rule reported their presence to the Clerk:
Mr. ABBOTT,
Mr. ARNOLD,
Mr. BAYNE,
Mr. BLAND,
Mr. BUNNELL,
Mr. FRENCH,
Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa,
Mr. LEE,
Mr. McRAE,
Mr. PERKINS,
Mr. STEWART, of Vermont,
Mr. STRUBLE, and
Mr. THOMPSON, of California.
Mr. BURNES. I offer the resolution which I send to the desk.
The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Sergeant-at-Arms take into custody and bring to the bar of the House such of its members as are now absent without leave of the House.

The resolution was agreed to.
Mr. KEAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that my colleague, Mr. McADOO, who is out of the city on business, be excused.
There was no objection, and it was so ordered.
Mr. DIBBLE. I ask that my colleague, Mr. DARGAN, be excused.
There was no objection, and it was so ordered.
Mr. DUNN. Mr. Speaker, my colleague, Mr. PEEL, is absent by leave of the House. Is it necessary to ask that he be excused?
The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is not.
Mr. DIBBLE. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.
The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.
Mr. DIBBLE. I wish to ask the Chair how many members are shown to be present by the roll-call and the list of members who have since reported to the Clerk?
The SPEAKER pro tempore. One hundred and fifty-eight members answered on the call, and eleven have since reported, making the total number one hundred and sixty-nine.
Mr. DIBBLE. That being a quorum, I desire to ask unanimous consent to make a proposition.
Mr. BURNES. I move that further proceedings under the call be dispensed with.
The motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BURNES. I move that the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the further consideration of appropriation bills.
Mr. DIBBLE. I ask unanimous consent to submit a proposition for unanimous consent.
The SPEAKER pro tempore. Pending the motion of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BURNES], the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. DIBBLE] asks unanimous consent to submit a proposition. Is there objection?
There was no objection.
Mr. DIBBLE. Mr. Speaker, my proposition is founded upon the fact that on examining the pairs of absentees I find that quite a number of those who would vote on the side of the question which I represent have been unable to get here in time, and that the number of absentees on that side is much larger in proportion than on the other side. In view of that fact, in order that both sides may have an equal opportunity to have members present, so that there may be a full vote on this question, I ask unanimous consent that it be made a special order for Tuesday next at 1 o'clock, so that on this day we may go into committee and settle the question. At that time I will raise no point as to a quorum, and I do not think any such point will be raised. I do not think the necessity for raising it will exist. This arrangement will give an opportunity to members who desire to be present so that we may have a full vote and a fair and proper settlement of this question. A number of telegrams have been received from members, I suppose on both sides, expressing a desire to be present when the final vote is taken. Therefore, in the interest of the dispatch of business I submit what I think is a fair proposition.
Mr. BURNES. Mr. Speaker, I presume I shall have unanimous consent to make a reply to the proposition of the gentleman from South Carolina. We have under consideration one of the general appropriation bills of this House. We are near the close of August and there are gentlemen who are claiming that we are detaining the Senate in session. At any rate we are considering a general appropriation bill. We have upon our Calendars probably ten thousand claims of equal merit, to say the least for them, with the claims now under consideration. Why, then, should we be so anxious to retard the general business of Congress, to disappoint the expectations of the country, and to keep ourselves here struggling in a close House with closed doors over this business, when at best but $448,000 of these claims could be considered in this bill under any view of the point of order pending, and the forty millions that are trooping on behind are certainly as meritorious as those which by chance, possibly, but perhaps design, have got to the front?
The general public business of Congress is now paralyzed for certain private claims of a century's age, and we keep ourselves here housed in the heat of the dog-days for no better purpose than that of securing special advantage for a class of claims no better, but much worse, than other classes of claims also pending.
It seems to me that the general welfare of the whole people and public laws rather than private ones should be preferred. Sixty millions of people should be preferred over five thousand people in whose names these spoliation claims are preferred and pressed with a persistency unparalleled. The proposition of the gentleman from South Carolina contemplates the postponement of a general appropriation bill now under consideration. I oppose such delay. Gentlemen who are absent are under the same obligations to be present that we are.
I decline the proposition of the gentleman from South Carolina, and I do it with all proper respect to him and in all kindness. This general appropriation bill has a right to be passed upon and considered without delay. Furthermore, there are only five thousand people, at the most, interested in these claims, while in this bill, exclusive of these claims, there are to my certain knowledge ten thousand people, equally meritorious, whose claims are beyond dispute—soldiers of the Republic, their widows and their orphans, who have little appropriations in this bill, Treasury allowances for bounty, back pay, commutation of rations, lost horses, and the like, the allowance of which will carry sunshine and happiness to their little homes. Shall we then postpone this general appropriation bill as such, and take the usual and ordinary course with these spoliation claims?
Sir, the time is now here—this moment—when the House of Representatives, regardless of party policies, should declare for the transaction of the public business of the Congress and the country, and rebuke any and all attempts to give any class of claims such an exclusive consideration as the proposition involves. Already this attempt to secure special privileges for one class of claims over all other classes has cost us much valuable time and long delayed the passage of a bill against which (with spoliation claims eliminated) there is not a single voice. With my consent there shall be no further delay. I take occasion to notify the House and the country that I shall lose no occasion to press this bill to a final passage.
Mr. DIBBLE. Mr. Speaker——
The SPEAKER pro tempore. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?
Mr. DIBBLE. Has the regular order been demanded?
Mr. BLAND. I demand the regular order.
The SPEAKER pro tempore. As the Chair understands the situation, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BURNES] moved that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the further consideration of appropriation bills, and pending that the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. DIBBLE] obtained unanimous consent to submit a proposition to the House. The Chair understands that proposition to be objected to, and the question now recurs upon the motion of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BURNES] that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the further consideration of appropriation bills.
Mr. DIBBLE. Pending that I move, as a quorum has now been developed, that the House take a recess until 8 o'clock to-night.
The question being taken on the motion of Mr. DIBBLE, there were—ayes 58, noes 54.
Mr. BURNES. I make the point of no quorum, and call for tellers.
The SPEAKER pro tempore. No quorum having voted, the Chair will order tellers.
Mr. DIBBLE. I suppose we had better have the yeas and nays.
Mr. DOCKERY. I hope the gentleman will not ask for the yeas and nays

Mr. DIBBLE. The gentleman from Missouri has made the point of no quorum, and the yeas and nays will be the best way to settle the question.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman call for the yeas and nays?

Mr. DIBBLE. Well, let the count by tellers go on.

Mr. BURNES and Mr. DIBBLE were appointed as tellers.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. DIBBLE] will please give his attention for a moment. The Chair understands the gentleman's motion to include the idea that the evening session be devoted to the consideration of the business which has heretofore been set apart for Friday evenings.

Mr. DIBBLE. I presume so, of course.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas (before the tellers had announced their count). Mr. Speaker, would it be in order to inquire how the vote stands?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If all gentlemen who desire to vote have done so, the Chair will announce the result.

Mr. BURNES. Before the announcement is made, I would like to make a very brief statement.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to make a statement.

Mr. DIBBLE. I suppose I shall be included in that request.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Missouri and the gentleman from South Carolina each desires to make a statement. Is there objection?

Mr. CULBERSON. Regular order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular order is demanded. The Chair will announce the result. On this question the ayes are 68, the noes 62. No quorum has voted.

Mr. FARQUHAR. No one made the point.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BURNES] made the point, and thereupon the Chair ordered tellers.

Mr. FARQUHAR. The point has not been made since the announcement by the Chair.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Upon the point of "no quorum" being made, tellers were ordered by the Chair; and unless the gentleman from Missouri withdraws his point, the Chair will certainly not consider it withdrawn.

Mr. BURNES. I desire very much to make a statement, which I think would be of interest to the House. [Cries of "Go on!"]

Mr. DOCKERY. I hope my colleague [Mr. BURNES] will have the opportunity he asks.

Mr. DIBBLE. I hope I shall be included in the same privilege.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will again put the question. Is there objection to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BURNES] and the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. DIBBLE] making each a statement to the House?

Mr. CULBERSON. Regular order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular order is demanded, which is equivalent to an objection.

The tellers resumed their count.

Mr. BURNES (before the count was concluded). I ask unanimous consent for one minute of time to be occupied by the gentleman from South Carolina and myself.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from South Carolina and himself be allowed one minute each, in which to make an explanation. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. BURNES. Mr. Speaker, I have every disposition in the world to preserve the pension session to-night; and if this remaining half hour of to-day's session shall be devoted to the consideration of a general appropriation bill, I pledge myself that I will do no act which will place upon the record the fact that there is no quorum; so that the pension session can go on.

Mr. DIBBLE. Mr. Speaker, it so happens that just at the present the gentleman from Missouri would have to make the point of "no quorum" in order to defeat the pension session.

Mr. BURNES. I beg pardon; I would not have to make that point; and the Chair has so decided. The point has already been made.

Mr. DIBBLE. So far as that is concerned, I have only this to say: We can not transact any business in the half hour remaining of to-day's session. I do not think it right that we should be forced to vote on a question in regard to which a great many who think with us are, as I have stated, absentees. Therefore I suggest to my friend that he withdraw the point of "no quorum" and allow the recess to be taken, as a majority of those present have voted in favor of it. I made that motion simply because I am consistent with my record on the French spoliation matter. I am proposing to sustain a general order of the House. Therefore, if the gentleman will withdraw his point, the recess will simply be taken one half-hour earlier than usual. Otherwise we shall waste that half hour, and be no further along than we are now.

Mr. BURNES. Mr. Speaker, I reserved the balance of my time, and use it now simply for the purpose of saying that I am gratified to hear from the gentleman from South Carolina that upon the pending point of order he can speak for all the absent friends of these claimants and these claims. I am gratified that he can with perfect certainty count on every friend of these spoliation claims who is absent as being in favor of the pending point of order. The interest they have shown for their payment must be deemed paramount to a just decision of the law on the point of order. I hope they are not all "made that way."

Mr. DIBBLE. I will take the balance of my time to say that I intend they shall have the opportunity, so far as I can procure it for them, whether, when they come back here, they vote for or against the claims. They have been favorable to them heretofore; and while those who are favorable to them now present appear to be in the minority, I believe that those who are favorable to them are in the majority of those absent from the House.

Mr. DUNN. Does the gentleman from South Carolina speak for all those who are absent? Some of them, like some of those present, may have changed their opinions.

Mr. DIBBLE. I am in favor of giving those who are absent an opportunity to record themselves upon this question, whether their views be changed or not.

PRINTING PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, on yesterday the House directed the Committee on Printing to investigate and report to the House the cost of printing the President's message on the subject of our relations with Canada, and the statutes and treaties therein referred to. The committee has made the investigation and find that it will cost $356.40 to print 15,000 copies of the document referred to. I ask the Chair now if I may submit the report pending this count by tellers?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It could only be done now by unanimous consent.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I ask unanimous consent to submit the report at this time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to suspending the present proceedings temporarily to enable the gentleman from Tennessee to submit a report from the Committee on Printing for present consideration?

There was no objection.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I now send to the desk the report, which I ask to have read.

I want to state, Mr. Speaker, that there was no resolution introduced on yesterday, and hence we can not report one back to the House, but simply report back the proposition ordered to be investigated by the Committee on Printing, and on which we base the report. I now make the report, and follow it with a motion to print 15,000 copies of the message and documents referred to.

Mr. FARQUHAR. I would like to ask, Mr. Speaker, if the order of the House made on yesterday is a matter of record on the minutes this morning? I refer to the order instructing the Committee on Printing to make this report.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair supposes the Journal will show everything that was done in that connection.

Mr. FARQUHAR. There was no resolution offered at the time; simply a verbal motion; and I want to know if, as a matter of fact, the Journal of the proceedings of yesterday shows that there was sufficient authority given to the committee to make this investigation and report?

Mr. RICHARDSON. The order was formally made upon the committee to submit a report.

Mr. FARQUHAR. The Speaker has not so stated.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Journal Clerk states that he himself reduced the motion to the form of a resolution, the form in which it appears upon the Journal.

The Clerk will read the report submitted by the gentleman from Tennessee.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Printing have considered the proposition to print 15,000 copies of the President's message on the subject of the relations with Canada, together with the treaties and statutes therein mentioned, which was referred to this committee on yesterday by the House. The committee find that the estimated cost of printing same is $356.40. They therefore direct me to make report to the House and recommend that 15,000 of said documents be printed for the use of the House.

The report was adopted.

Mr. RICHARDSON moved to reconsider the vote by which the report was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The tellers will resume their places and the count will be renewed upon the proposition submitted by the gentleman from South Carolina, that the House now take a recess until 8 o'clock, upon which motion no quorum has yet voted.

Mr. PETERS. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. PETERS. If the hour of 5 o'clock arrives while this count is progressing without the appearance of a quorum, can there be any business transacted at the evening session set apart for to-night?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Unless there is record evidence that there is no quorum voting when the House resumes its session at the evening session to-night, unless some question of quorum shall then be raised, the present occupant of the chair thinks it will be entirely in order to proceed to transact the usual business fixed by the special order. When the hour of 5 o'clock arrives it will be the duty of the Chair under the previous order of the House to declare the House in recess until 8 o'clock, the evening session to be devoted to the consideration of pension bills. It occurs to the Chair that it would not follow, because no quorum is present on a vote by a division at the hour of recess, that there might not be a quorum at the hour of the reassembling of the House.

Mr. DIBBLE. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. DIBBLE. If we remain on the floor until 5 o'clock, there can be an evening session as usual?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The present occupant of the chair thinks that when the hour of 5 o'clock arrives, under the order of the House, it is the duty of the Chair to declare the House in recess until 8 o'clock.

Mr. DIBBLE. And the fact that a quorum has not voted by tellers when the hour of 5 o'clock arrives would not necessarily preclude the work of the night session?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair thinks not.

Mr. BURNES. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. Can gentlemen who have passed between the tellers change their votes?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state that he sees no objection to that.

Mr. BURNES (after further proceedings under the count). I withdraw the point of no quorum.

Mr. DIBBLE. With the understanding that the gentleman from Missouri will repeat the motion for a recess, I will state that I will not make the point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. On this question the yeas are 64, the nays 69; the noes have it and the House refuses to take a recess.

Mr. BURNES. I move that we take a recess until 8 o'clock p. m.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 40 minutes p. m.) the House took a recess until 8 o'clock p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The recess having expired, the House was called to order by Mr. CRISP, the Speaker pro tempore.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read the order under which the evening session is held.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That, until further ordered, on each Friday, at 5 o'clock p. m., the House shall take a recess until 7.30 p. m., and after the 15th day of April next until 8 p. m., at which evening sessions bills on the Private Calendar granting pensions, reported from the Committee on Invalid Pensions and the Committee on Pensions, and bills on the Private Calendar reported from the Committee on the Judiciary removing political disabilities, shall be considered, and no other business shall be transacted at such evening sessions, and the House shall adjourn on each of said evenings not later than 10.30 p. m.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MATSON. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole to consider bills under the special order.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, Mr. DOCKERY in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole under the special order.

Mr. MATSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask, by unanimous consent, that the roll of members be called in alphabetical order, and each member present, when his name is called, be allowed to call up a bill for consideration. I also ask that the names of delegates be included in the list.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the request of the gentleman from Indiana will be taken as the order of the House. [After a pause.] The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered.

The Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

DANIEL WILLBORG.

Mr. ADAMS. I ask consideration of the bill (H. R. 2073) granting an increase of pension to Daniel Willborg.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to increase the pension of Daniel Willborg, late of Company C, Forty-third Illinois Volunteers, from $4 per month to $16 per month, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws.

The report (by Mr. LANE) was read, as follows:

The committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2073) granting an increase of pension to Daniel Willborg, have duly considered the same, and beg leave to submit the following report:

That the claimant now draws a pension of $4 per month for injury to hip and thigh; that he bases his claim for increase of pension on the ground that he was ruptured.

The Department refused to grant the increase on the ground that he failed to show origin of rupture in service.

Hugo M. Starkloff, being duly sworn, testifies that he was formerly surgeon of the Forty-third Regiment of Infantry, Illinois Volunteers; that he was acquainted with Daniel Willborg, who was a private of Company C of said regiment; that at the date of his enlistment he was in sound bodily health and free from hernia. He further says that claimant, while in line of duty, guarding baggage train during the march from Bethel to Jackson, received an injury by a wagon tipping over upon him, said injury being hernia and injury to hip; that he was disabled thereby, and that he was honorably discharged for said disabilities.

Dr. Charles W. Johnson, being sworn, testifies that he has been engaged in the practice of medicine seven years; that he has examined claimant and found that he has an extensive suppurating sore on left hip; that he is also ruptured, and can not wear a truss on account of said sore; that he is entirely unable to work and walks about with the assistance of a cane.

Dr. M. Youngstedt, a regular practicing physician of fifteen years' standing, testifies that he examined claimant and found him ruptured and suffering from suppurating sores on left hip; that he is unable to wear a truss and is, therefore, entirely unable to perform manual labor. He says, further, that in his opinion said claimant will never be able to perform any manual labor.

Your committee think these facts warrant us in the conclusion that the claimant is entitled to an increase of pension, and we therefore respectfully recommend that this bill do pass.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

GEORGE C. QUICK.

Mr. BAKER, of Illinois. I call up for consideration the bill (H. R. 10738) to increase the pension of George C. Quick.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to continue the name of George C. Quick, late a private in Captain Miller's company of Illinois Mounted Rangers, in the war with the Indians commonly called the Black Hawk war, on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of law, at the rate of $45 per month, in lieu of the pension of $16 per month now received by said Quick.

The report (by Mr. BLISS) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 10738) to increase the pension of George C. Quick, have considered the same, and report as follows:

The claimant was a private in Captain Miller's company of Illinois Mounted Rangers in the Black Hawk war. He was honorably discharged in August, 1832. His name was placed on the pension-roll at the rate of $8 per month from July 15, 1882, for disease of feet, and his pension has since been increased to $12, and then to $16 per month, as the disability increased. The increase to $16 was granted from the 5th day of December, 1883.

The board of examining surgeons at St. Louis, Mo., under date of December 5, 1883, stated as follows:

"The examination of applicant reveals the following conditions: The arch of both feet is increased, contraction of plantar muscles. Skin of feet thin and scaly. Locomotion much impaired. Complains that walking causes cramps. Says that he can not perform manual labor, which statement we believe to be true."

On August 6, 1884, the board of examining surgeons at Duquoin, Ill., stated: "We find the plantar surfaces of both feet congested, soft, and tender."

There has also been filed with your committee the testimony of Drs. S. F. Wehr, C. G. Rayhill, and M. S. Carr, all reputable physicians, who testify to the condition of claimant's feet, and who state that he is unable to perform any manual labor.

The claimant is seventy-three years of age, and in poor financial circumstances. As his disability is such as to incapacitate him for manual labor, he should be allowed an increase of pension to $30 per month, which is the rate allowed in similar cases for such a degree of disability.

Your committee, therefore, recommend the passage of the bill, amended, however, by striking out the words "forty-five," in line 8, and inserting in lieu thereof the word "thirty."

The amendment was agreed to, and the bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

MARY WOODWORTH.

Mr. BOOTHMAN. I ask consideration of the bill (H. R. 7657) granting a pension to Mary Woodworth, widow of Ebenezer F. Woodworth.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place the name of Mrs. Mary Woodworth, widow of Ebenezer F. Woodworth, late of Company L, Second Regiment Michigan Cavalry Volunteers, on the pension-roll, at the rate prescribed by existing provisions of law.

The report (by Mr. THOMPSON, of Ohio) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 7657) for the relief of Mary Woodworth, submit the following report:

Mary Woodworth is the widow of Ebenezer F. Woodworth, late a private in Company L, Third Regiment of Michigan Cavalry Volunteers. Said soldier enlisted at Detroit, Mich., October 1, 1861. The company descriptive book reports him deserted from camp near Farmington, Miss., May 12, 1862. Muster-out roll of the company, dated October 24, 1864, reports him deserted May 12, 1862, near Farmington, Miss.

Claimant filed an application for pension July 15, 1867, and the claim was rejected October 7, 1878, on the ground that the soldier was a deserter. The claim has been in the hands of several special examiners and the testimony secured seems to establish the facts that the soldier was a dealer in a small way in tobacco and cigars and that he was allowed certain privileges by his captain, with whom he was at times very intimate; that he (the soldier) loaned money often and came to be called the "banker;" that he loaned money to the captain; that not long before his alleged desertion he and the captain had a quarrel.

One comrade testifies that he knew the soldier (Woodworth) to have had several hundred dollars about his person when last seen with his company. On the day on which he was last seen he was left in his tent caring for a sore leg, and several other men were left in camp during that day, while the company went with the regiment on a scout and was absent all day. On the return it was reported that the soldier Woodworth had deserted. The captain (Thomas H. Botham) did not, as was usual, report said soldier "absent without leave" or "missing," but at the first roll-call after he was found absent said to the orderly, "Mark him a deserter, G—d d—n him," as shown by the affidavit of First Lieut. Oliver C. Leonardson. Said Lieutenant Leonardson further makes oath that at the time he protested that to mark the said soldier a deserter was an "outrage." Said Lieutenant Leonardson further makes oath that about two months after this time said captain resigned because, as he (Lieutenant Leonardson) was informed and believes, he (Captain Botham) feared death at the hands of his own men for the many acts of injustice towards them.

Joseph W. Huston, a first lieutenant of Company C of the same regiment, makes affidavit that—

"Botham was held in very low esteem by the officers of said regiment, on account of his brutal instincts and his licentious and dissipated habits. He was continually engaged in quarrels and personal altercations with the members of his company, which not infrequently resulted in personal violence. That Botham should have, in a moment of passion (for his temper was uncontrolled either by judgment, moral principle, or education), or for the gratification of personal malice, wrongfully or inconsiderately have charged any member of his company with desertion or any other offense, would seem to affiant to be strictly consonant with the nature and character of the man."

Captain Botham did not order any hunt or make any inquiry as to the whereabouts of the missing man, but his comrades testify that on the day when the soldier was left in camp as aforesaid, while the company went on a scout, he went to a creek within the lines to wash clothing and that on the next day some of his clothes were found on the bushes near the creek. Comrades also testify that near the missing man's clothing so found were discovered wheel tracks not made with an army wagon. The tendency of the testimony is to show that the soldier, on account of his sore leg, was obliged to use a crutch or cane, or both, to travel, and that he could not on that account have deserted; also, that at this time they were in close proximity to the enemy, and for that reason the soldier could not have deserted, as skirmishes were almost daily occurring; also, that he would not be inclined to desert when the men and officers were owing him sums of money. A part of the testimony given shows that the man, Ebenezer F. Woodworth, came to his death at the hands of his comrades who were left in camp with him on the day on which he was last seen.

Joseph W. Huston, a first lieutenant of Company C of the same regiment, makes affidavit that he firmly believes that the said soldier gave up his life for his country; that the charge of desertion is "undeserved, false, wicked, malicious."

Dr. Andrews, surgeon, writing to a daughter of the said soldier, says:

"I do not now see any reason why your father's army record should not be corrected in accordance with the facts. It is now certain that the whole story about your father's desertion originated with Captain Botham, who was regarded in the Army as a passionate half-lunatic."

J. K. Mizner, major Fourth United States Cavalry, late colonel Third Michigan Cavalry, in a letter written in December, 1885, says:

"Unless the fact of desertion can be established by good and sufficient evidence the act of desertion should not be assumed, and your father's family allowed to suffer from an error in reporting him as a deserter."

Lieut. Monroe C. Carlton makes oath that—

"He has no recollection that it was charged or believed at the time that the said E. T. Woodworth had deserted."

The committee recommend that the bill do pass.

Mr. KILGORE. I did not hear the reading of the report distinctly, and I will ask if I am to understand that this bill is to pension a man who deserted from the Army?

Mr. BOOTHMAN. This man was a soldier in a Michigan regiment who was left in camp unable from a crippled limb to get around without a stick or crutch. He went from his camp to a little stream near by to do some washing. That was the last that was seen of him. His captain was a very passionate man and had had some trouble with him a few days before, and a few days after he was missing he directed the officer to mark him as a deserter.

Mr. KILGORE. Would it not be just as reasonable to say that he deserted and came over to our side?

Mr. BOOTHMAN. The evidence shows that he was murdered.

Mr. KILGORE. What evidence is there on that point?

Mr. BOOTHMAN. His clothes were found there. His disappearance occurred at a time when there was a large amount of money due him from some members of the company and regiment, and when there was no motive that the man could possibly have had for deserting. Nothing has been heard of him since; and this is to place his widow on the pension-roll the same as other widows.

Mr. KILGORE. I am very much disposed to antagonize this bill.

Mr. BOOTHMAN. I wish to read for the information of the gentleman a letter about Mrs. Woodworth's daughter.

CLEVELAND, OHIO, August 6, 1888.

DEAR SIR: * * * Mrs. Woodworth's daughter, who has worked up all the evidence to get the charge of desertion removed from her father's memory, is now lying at the point of death, and I want to see this bill pass the House before she dies. She is the bravest little woman I ever saw. Six years ago I had a pension agent look into the case, and after a thorough investigation he told me that it was impossible to have the charge of desertion removed. Well, the little girl said her father was not a deserter. She wrote letters to the colonel and all the officers and nearly all the men in her father's regiment and secured evidence that he was murdered instead of being a deserter. She visited the officers at their regimental reunion, spoke to them, and had a hall full of wild men in tears before her. The regiment then took action in her father's behalf, all of which is before Congress. She has worked herself out to get this pension for her old mother.

* * * * * * *

Yours, truly,

JOHN C. CAVERT.

While the letter was being read,

Mr. KILGORE. That is sufficient. How much do you want? [Laughter.]

Mr. BOOTHMAN. All that is asked is $12. The same as other widows.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

MARY VANBUSKIRK.

Mr. BUNNELL. I call up the bill (H. R. 11029) for the relief of Mary Vanbuskirk.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the name of Mary Vanbuskirk, widow of John E. Vanbuskirk, private in Company G, First Regiment United States Artillery, Florida war, and pay her a pension, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws.

The report (by Mr. BLISS) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 11029) granting a pension to Mary Vanbuskirk, have considered the same, and report as follows:

The claimant is the widow of John B. Vanbuskirk, who was a soldier from January 23, 1836 to January 23, 1839, in Battery G, First United States Artillery. He served in the Florida Indian war.

The widow is nearly seventy years of age, and in need of relief, as it is shown by a numerously-signed petition of her neighbors and townsmen.

She is entitled to a service pension under the bill recently reported by this committee for the survivors and widows of survivors of the Indian wars.

You committee recommend the passage of the bill.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

SUSAN E. LATTURE.

Mr. BUTLER. I call up the bill (H. R. 11030) granting a pension to Susan E. Latture.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the name of Susan E. Latture, widow of Jacob Latture, late a private of Company D, Fifth Tennessee Volunteers, Mexican war, subject to the limitations and provisions of the pension laws.

The report (by Mr. BLISS) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 11030) granting a pension to Susan E. Latture, have considered the same, and report as follows:

The husband of the claimant was a soldier in the war with Mexico. He served as a private in Company D, Fifth Tennessee Volunteers, for that war, having been enlisted November 7, 1847, and discharged July 20, 1848. He died in January, 1883, from catarrh and diabetes mellitus.

His widow's claim for pension was rejected upon the ground that the disease of which the soldier died was not due to his military service.

Your committee have examined the papers in the claim, with other evidence produced before them, and find the following facts to be established, namely: That the soldier was sound when he enlisted for the Mexican war; that he contracted disease while in service and continued diseased until his death.

Col. George R. McClennan, who commanded the regiment in which soldier served, testifies that while in Mexico and in the line of duty the soldier contracted chronic diarrhea and chills and fever of a malignant form, and that he remained in bad health ever after the war until his death.

John McCrary, a fellow soldier, testifies to a similar state of facts.

Dr. M. M. Martin treated claimant from 1872 until the time of his death for chronic diarrhea, and also for chronic catarrh and diabetes, and that death was due directly to diabetes.

Other testimony shows that diarrhea and chills and fever continued to affect soldier from discharge up to 1872 and since, and while it may not be established according to the rules of pathology that diabetes was due to the chronic diarrhea and malaria, this would seem to be a case wherein the benefit of the doubt should be cast in favor of the widow of the soldier.

Moreover, the widow in a few years will reach the age when she would be entitled to a service pension by reason of her husband's services in Mexico. She is now in a dependent condition and a worthy object for pension.

Your committee recommend the passage of the bill.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

RICHARD PORTER.

Mr. CARUTH. I call up the bill (H. R. 10241) increasing the pension of Richard Porter.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to pay to Richard Porter, late a private in Company B, One hundred and ninth Regiment United States Colored Troops, a monthly pension of $72, instead of $4, the amount now paid, the said Richard Porter being totally blind.

The report (by Mr. HUNTER) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 10241) increasing the pension of Richard Porter, submit the following report:

The soldier, Richard Porter, was a member of Company B, One hundred and ninth United States Colored Troops. He enlisted June 13, 1864, and was mustered out with his company February 6, 1866.

The evidence of the surgeon of the regiment, Dr. S. H. Gratzny, shows that—

"Richard Porter, an enlisted man in Company B, while in Texas, was afflicted with rheumatism and scurvy, and was also suffering from dengue fever, from the effects of which he was entirely disabled for duty. The said claimant's eyes were also affected from the dengue fever."

The captain of the company, Edward Keplinger, swears—

"That after Porter's return from the hospital to the company he was troubled with inflamed and watery eyes; continued to have this trouble as long as they were together in the service."

The proof shows that this eye trouble continued after the discharge, he having been treated by several physicians and specialists until total blindness was the result.

In April, 1885, Porter filed an application for a pension. In April, 1888, he was granted a pension and rated at $4 a month. There seems to be a controversy among the medical men as to the actual cause of this loss of sight, hence the small rate allowed. However, the fact remains that this soldier of the Union had a disease of the eyes in the Army which might result in loss of sight; that he is totally blind now; in destitute circumstances; an object of charity. The doubts as to the origin of the disease which led to this blindness should be resolved in favor of the soldier. In the opinion of the committee his pension should be increased. They therefore recommend that the words "seventy-two," in the sixth line, be stricken out and the word "forty" be substituted therefor, and when so amended the bill do pass.

Mr. KILGORE. I ask the gentleman from Kentucky whether he will not compromise on $25 a month in this case?

Mr. CARUTH. No, sir; I will not compromise on $25 a month in this case, and the gentleman from Texas would not ask it if he knew the circumstances of the case.

Mr. KILGORE. How could this man be down in Texas as a Federal soldier and lose his eyesight?

Mr. CARUTH. He was trying to whip you fellows into submission to that flag. [Laughter.]

Mr. KILGORE. Did he not get his sore eyes after the war?

Mr. CARUTH. No, sir; he got them during the war.

Mr. KILGORE. I never heard of any Federal soldiers in Texas during the war. This must be an ingenious device to pension some Confederate soldier, because that is the only kind of soldier that was there during the war. [Laughter.]

Mr. CARUTH. The trouble, I suppose, with the gentleman from Texas is that during the war he did not want to hear or see anything about Federal soldiers in Texas. [Laughter.] He probably did not come within either seeing or hearing distance of the Union soldiers. [Laughter.] The fact remains that this soldier was there, and that from the effects of the Texas fever, which is politely called by another name in the report, he got sore eyes; that he became disabled, and that after the war his defective vision continued until it eventuated in an entire loss of sight, and he is now blind—a blind beggar upon the streets of Louisville. And, although I have upon this docket a number of cases for white people, men and women, soldiers and widows of soldiers, I have preferred, as a matter of justice and as a matter of charity, to call up to-night for the consideration of the House this claim for this poor blind negro soldier of the Union Army who may, for aught I know, and I suppose who will, vote the Republican ticket [laughter], because he will not know any better, as he can not see. [Laughter.]

Mr. KILGORE. If he gets this pension how will he probably vote? [Laughter.]

Mr. CARUTH. He is a sensible man, and he knows a good Representative in Congress when he sees him, so he will certainly vote for my re-election. [Renewed laughter.]

Mr. KILGORE. Mr. Chairman, I am inclined to move to amend this bill so as to make the amount $30 instead of forty. [Cries of "No!" "No!"]

Mr. CARUTH. Upon the Committee on Invalid Pensions there are two physicians that I know of. One of them is the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], and the other is my colleague [Mr. HUNTER]. I give them both a free advertisement when I say that they are skillful men in their profession, and they were of the opinion from the examination of these papers that this man should have been granted the full rating under the law, $72 a month, and that rate ought to have been given in the Pension Office, but there was a disagreement of medical authorities. I introduced the bill here for $72 a month, and he would have gotten that amount if he had obtained his rights; but the committee decided to report the bill at the rate of $40 a month, and I think that is quite little enough under the circumstances.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the gentleman will permit me to say a word, we followed the universal rule in the committee. During this Congress we have passed four or five bills at $40 a month in cases identical in their nature with this.

Mr. KILGORE. I understand that where there is no question as to the cause of the blindness that is the rule.

Mr. GALLINGER. No; it is the rule where there is question. If there were no question the Pension Office would have allowed the pension. The committee, having examined the case, gave the man the benefit of the equity, and reported the bill at $40 a month.

Mr. KILGORE. Did the Pension Office refuse him a pension entirely?

Mr. CARUTH. No; they granted him a pension of $4 a month.

Mr. KILGORE. Well, I will move to amend by striking out "$40" and inserting "$30."

The amendment was rejected.

The question recurring on the amendment of the committee to strike out "$72" and insert "$40," the amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

MRS. ELIZABETH G. SCOTT.

Mr. CASWELL. I call up the bill (S. 944) increasing the pension of Mrs. Elizabeth G. Scott.

The bill was read, as follows:

Mr. CHEADLE. I give notice that I shall object to the consideration of any of these bills granting a higher rate of pension than that authorized by law.

Mr. CASWELL. It seems to me that if the gentleman would hear this report read he would not object. This is the case of the widow of an army officer who served the country faithfully for thirty years. She is not a resident of my district nor my State. In fact, I never saw her in my life. In asking favorable action on this bill I am actuated only by a desire to do justice to the widow of a very worthy officer with whom all the older members of this House, I presume, had an intimate acquaintance while he was in charge of the records of the war here in this city. When he died he left his widow destitute, she being dependent, as I understand, upon her relatives for support. It seems to me the case is full of merit, and I trust the gentleman will not object to its consideration. I am perfectly willing to abide by the vote of the Committee of the Whole.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CHEADLE] does, however, object.

Mr. CASWELL. I do not understand that the gentleman has the right to object.

The CHAIRMAN. He has no right to object; but as the Chair understands, he intimates his purpose to insist on a quorum.

Mr. CASWELL. Then, Mr. Chairman, I will withdraw that bill and ask leave to present another.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. CASWELL] withdraws the bill just sent up, and, if there be no objection, will call up another.

HARRIET WELCH.

Mr. CASWELL. I now call up the bill (S. 2899) granting a pension to Harriet Welch.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the name of Harriet Welch, widow of Cyraneous Welch, late a private in Company C, Thirty-eighth Regiment Wisconsin Volunteers, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws.

The report (by Mr. SAWYER) was read, as follows:

From an examination of the facts as stated in the Senate report made herein, and which is adopted and made a part hereof, they believe that this is a meritorious case, and they therefore recommend that the bill do pass.

[Senate Report No. 1321, Fiftieth Congress, first session.]

Harriet Welch is the widow of Cyraneous Welch, who was a private in Company C, Thirty-eighth Regiment Wisconsin Volunteers. Her husband was severely wounded in the service and line of duty, and the Pension Office gave him a pension on account of his wounded leg, and, inasmuch as the disability was progressive, the pension was increased. His lameness continued to grow worse; so much so as to disqualify him for manual labor and to make him to a considerable extent helpless. He again applied for an increase of pension, and while the claim was pending he was ordered to Green Bay for examination by the medical board in order to determine the degree and rating due to his increased infirmity. On his return from Green Bay, the 7th of September, 1877, he fell from the cars upon the track and was killed. In reference to this accident, John Hammer testified that Welch's leg was so crippled that it often failed him, and it is his belief that his leg gave out and caused him to fall between the cars when he was crushed to death.

During the first session of the Forty-ninth Congress a bill for the relief of the widow of this soldier was passed by the Senate and House of Representatives, and was vetoed by the President. In his objections to the bill the Executive says:

"The widow's claim, based upon this state of facts, was rejected by the Pension Bureau on the ground that the accident resulting in death was not the result of his military service; and on an appeal taken to the Secretary of the Interior, on that determination, the same was sustained."

The committee were at the time aware of the action of the Bureau of Pensions and of the justification of its decision by the Secretary of the Interior. It was for the reason that an allowance of pension under the general laws could not be made that an appeal for relief was made to Congress; that a bill for her benefit was introduced and passed. The propriety of special legislation in certain cases is not questioned. In many instances in which severe hardship is the result of inability to comply with the requirements of the Pension Office as to proofs the Commissioner of Pensions admonishes the claimant that his or her only alternative is to appeal to Congress. Such appeals are often made, and in a majority of instances they are successful.

The committee know of no reason why the case of this widow should be made an exception. Her husband, by reason of his service, was made practically helpless. In his crippled condition he was unable to do anything for her support. In consequence of his untimely death the pension ceased. From that time to the present she has been in the lowest depths of poverty. In a letter to the Senator who makes this report, dated May 4, 1888, she describes her condition in pathetic terms. She says she is so poor she had to spend the winter with some friends. She is unable to work, has no friends upon whom she has a claim, no money, no home, no comforts. She appealed to the poor-master for relief, and he said he would send her to the poor-house, and she asks:

"Is this the fate of a soldier's wife? I pray that the President will open his heart and let me have my pension; I pray he may never suffer for lack of food as I have done."

The committee, in reporting this bill, assume with entire confidence that Congress is not exceeding its powers in extending relief by special enactment in this and like instances. They also agree with the President that this is indeed a pitiable case, and they believe, with a full understanding of it, it will meet his approval.

The bill is reported favorably with a recommendation that it do pass.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

JOHN ROBESON.

Mr. CHEADLE. I call up the bill (H. R. 6201) granting a pension to John Robeson.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to put on the pension-roll the name of John Robeson, late of Company H, Sixty-eighth Regiment of Indiana Volunteers, and to grant him a pension, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws.

The report (by Mr. MATSON) was read, as follows:

Claimant was enrolled August 5, 1862, in Company H, Sixty-eighth Indiana Volunteers, and was discharged November 21, 1862, "because of asthma, with which he has been afflicted from his infancy," as stated in certificate of discharge.

In declaration filed October 24, 1879, he alleges that "while in line of duty at Lebanon, Ky., on or about September 1, 1862, he was severely attacked with asthma, and previous to being so attacked he had been greatly exposed night and day while on guard, doing such duty, etc." The claim was rejected on the ground that the alleged asthma existed prior to claimant's enlistment.

The case has been very thoroughly investigated by special examiners, and after a careful examination of the evidence by the committee we believe that it is fully shown by a large preponderance of testimony that the claimant was a sound, healthy man at the time of enlistment, and that the disability for which he claims pension was incurred while serving in the Army and in line of duty. Special Examiner Robertson, who made a very exhaustive examination of the case, in closing his report says:

"The witnesses who have testified before me in this case are all reliable as to truth and veracity. While there is some difference as to prior soundness, in my opinion the weight of testimony is in favor of the claimant, and I recommend that this claim be allowed."

We deem it unnecessary to encumber the record by submitting extracts from the voluminous testimony on file, and therefore submit a favorable report, and recommend the passage of the bill.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

VICTORIA MAY.

Mr. CHIPMAN. I ask for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 10944) granting a pension to Victoria May.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby directed to place the name of Victoria May, widow of Paul May, late a private of Company K, Second Regiment of Michigan Volunteers, on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws.

The report (by Mr. CHIPMAN) was read, as follows:

Victoria May is the widow of Paul May, late a private in Company K, Second Regiment Michigan Volunteer Infantry. He enlisted at the beginning of the war in 1861, and served to the close in 1865. Several witnesses testify, as is shown by the files of the Pension Bureau, among them his lieutenant-colonel, that he was a sound, healthy man when he enlisted. His hospital record and the testimony of comrades and officers show that he was badly wounded in the back at Jackson, Miss., in July, 1863. He died in 1872. The testimony further discloses that he was broken down when he left the Army and continued so until he died, so much so as to be unable to perform hard labor.

Several witnesses of good reputation state that he habitually complained of the wound in his back as painful up to the time of his death. Dr. Truedell, a physician, attended him from immediately after his discharge until his death, was with him in his last sickness, and examined the wound, which was on the right of the dorsal vertebra, finding swelling, great soreness, and pain extending clear around to the right lung, and testifies that in his opinion the wound had never been cured, but that a tumor had been formed in that region reaching his right lung, which, in time, became affected, and was the cause of his death.

All this testimony was elicited on her claim for pension, which was rejected on the ground that the death was not caused by his military service. The reasons given for this are that the record of the city clerk's office in Detroit states that May died of bilious fever, and because the reputation of Dr. Truedell is not good. Who made the certificate on which the record is founded does not appear, as there was nothing in the clerk's office to show it.

As to Dr. Truedell's reputation there is no statement save that of the examiner; who assailed him is not disclosed; yet the claim was rejected on the ground that the physician who testified to cause of death "is old and unreliable." Dr. Truedell has resided over forty years in Detroit, is a regular physician, and practices largely in the portion of the city where the claimant lives. That the wound was in bad condition up to the soldier's death is proved by many witnesses, who testify that it was black, discolored, during his life and when he was prepared for the grave. It is not claimed that Dr. Truedell ever made any other statement, nor that he was cognizant of the death certificate.

The soldier, besides the widow, left several young children.

We recommend that the bill do pass.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

JACKSON CHAPMAN.

Mr. CONGER. I call up for consideration the bill (S. 2721) granting a pension to Jackson Chapman.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc. That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Jackson Chapman, late a member of Company E, Forty-fifth Regiment of Iowa Volunteer Infantry.

The report (by Mr. MORRILL) was read, as follows:

The report of the Senate Committee on Pensions is as follows:

"The case covered by the bill was before this committee at the first session of the Forty-ninth Congress, when it was examined and reported on by Senator SAWYER. His report, adopted by the committee then and laid before the Senate May 4, 1886, is approved by the committee now, with the recommendation for the passage of the bill. It is as follows:

"The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2075) granting a pension to Jackson Chapman, have examined the same, and report:

"The petitioner was in the Iowa infantry, as a private, from December, 1862, to April, 1863; enlisted again for one hundred days, and was mustered out with his company September 16, 1864. This is record testimony, and it is all there is except the almost invariable statement that the records furnish no evidence of disability, and that 'the regimental hospital records are not on file.'

"The soldier alleges that he was ruptured while lifting timbers to strengthen the fort at Moscow, Tenn., in anticipation of an attack from General Forrest when he made his raid in the spring of 1864. The event with which he connects his injury is a historical fact, and the record verifies his presence there at the time.

"In a letter to the Pension Office he makes this appeal:

"'I wish to know how I can get in possession of the surgeon's records that were kept the spring of 1863 on the quarantine island below St. Louis, while I was member of Company H, Thirty-seventh Iowa Infantry, then doing duty at St. Louis. I think it was some time in March. I was quarantined with smallpox, as the surgeon's book will show.'

"The War Department records furnish no information corroborative or contradictory of the statements made by the claimant; nevertheless the committee do not see that it is incumbent upon them to ignore what he says on account of the delinquency of those by whom the record is supposed to have been kept, or because the Government is unable to disprove his story. The existence of hernia at the present and for a long time heretofore is shown by the examining surgeon, who says:

"'He has inguinal hernia of the left side. The intestine readily descends into the scrotum when his truss is removed.'

"In reference to the matter Senator WILSON has stated in a letter to the committee that he has known the claimant several years, and for a considerable part of the time saw him almost every day; that he has been and is a poor man, and depends on his daily efforts for the support of himself and family; that during all the time he has known him he has presented the appearance of a man suffering from physical disability; that he has often talked with him about his pension claim, and was and is impressed that he stated his case truthfully, and that it ought to be allowed.

"In a letter to the Pension Office he speaks of having procured and forwarded the affidavit of the captain of his company, but it is not on the files; he also admits his inability to supply the proof required.

"The soldier's service record is good, and he is respected for his upright character by his neighbors. The war records do not supply what is required to prove or disprove his claim, but it has no record except that which verifies his service. There is no testimony to disprove his statements, but there is corroborative proof from the most reliable sources.

"The man is sixty-six years old, broken in health, and a daily sufferer from the injury he alleges, and the committee feel that it would be an act of cruelty to deny him the small relief for which he has been a long and patient suitor.

"The bill is reported favorably, with a recommendation that it do pass."

Since the preparation of the foregoing report claimant has filed the affidavit of two comrades, Jacob F. Garver and Welcome Beach, who testify that they were stationed at Moscow, Tenn., during the months of July and August, 1864; that some time during the latter month, while employed in placing heavy timbers upon Fort Kendrick for its defense, claimant received an injury to the abdomen, of which he complained during the remainder of his term of service. Affiants derived their knowledge from being present at the time and place above mentioned.

Your committee are of opinion that this additional evidence is fully corroborative of claimant's allegations, and therefore return the bill with the recommendation that it do pass.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ELEANOR D. HEATH.

Mr. CROUSE. I ask for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 7457) granting a pension to Eleanor D. Heath.

The bill was read, as follows:

The report (by Mr. THOMPSON, of Ohio) was read, as follows:

Examination of the claimant's case shows that Eleanor D. Heath was mother of Lewis Heath, late a private in Company H, One hundred and fourth Regiment Ohio Infantry. The soldier, Lewis Heath, was the support of his mother. He drew a pension by certificate No. 131763, and this pension was part of the means of support which soldier was able to give to his dependent mother. The soldier died from the result of injuries received in the service and in line of duty. Soon after soldier died his widow died. Soldier's mother is old, destitute, and without means of support, her son, the said Lewis Heath, having been her support notwithstanding that he had married and left a widow, whose death was not long after the soldier's death.

The Pension Bureau can not allow the mother to draw a pension for the death of her son, her support, because the soldier died leaving a widow.

The committee recommend that the bill do pass.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

HENRY ROSE.

Mr. DOCKERY. I call up the bill (H. R. 10007) for the relief of Henry Rose.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, directed to place on the pension-roll the name of Henry Rose, late private in Capt. William S. L. Deering's company, Maj. William Lauderdale's battalion, Tennessee troops in the Florida war, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws.

The report of the Committee on Pensions (by Mr. BLISS) was read, as follows:

The claimant was a private in Captain Dearing's company, Tennessee militia, Florida war, from November 1, 1837, to May 10, 1838. He filed a claim for pension for right inguinal hernia in February, 1884, but he was unable to find witnesses to prove that the disability was incurred during his military service in line of duty, though two comrades testify that they know he was suffering from said injury while in service, and that he claimed he had received it by lifting a log of wood in the performance of his duty.

The claimant is seventy-three years of age, affected by inguinal hernia, and in need of aid. He would be entitled to a service pension under the general bill recently reported by this committee to the House.

Your committee therefore recommend the passage of the bill.

Mr. KILGORE. Mr. Chairman, I wish to make a point of order on that bill. My understanding of the order authorizing this Friday night meeting for the consideration of private pension bills is that it is limited to pensions for soldiers in the late war.

Several MEMBERS. No.

Mr. KILGORE. If I am not mistaken—I may be mistaken—that is the limitation of the order.

Mr. CARUTH. I make the point of order against the gentleman.

Mr. KILGORE. Let the order be read.

The CHAIRMAN. The order embraces reports from the Committee on Pensions as well as reports from the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

WASHINGTON RYAN.

Mr. ENLOE called up the bill (H. R. 10629) granting a pension to Washington Ryan.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the name of Washington Ryan, who was a private soldier in Captain Netherland's company of Tennessee Volunteers in the Florida Indian war of 1836, and to pay him a pension at the rate of $25 per month.

The report (by Mr. BLISS) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Pensons, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 10629) granting a pension to Washington Ryan, have considered the same, and report as follows:

The claimant served twenty-two days, including travel, as third corporal, Capt. Richard Netherland's company, Third Regiment, Second Brigade, Tennessee Volunteer Militia—Indian war. He is now seventy-one years of age, old, infirm, and unable to earn a living by manual labor. Hon. J. D. C. Atkins and Hon. James D. Porter, of Tennessee, certify that the claimant is worthy and credible.

He is entitled to a service pension, in the opinion of your committee, and the passage of the bill is therefore recommended.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

JOHANNA GEYER.

Mr. FARQUHAR called up the bill (H. R. 2689) granting a pension to Johanna Geyer, widow of Gustav W. Geyer.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Johanna Geyer, widow of Gustav W. Geyer, late a private of Company H, One hundred and eighty-seventh New York Volunteers.

The report (by Mr. SAWYER) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2689) granting a pension to Johanna Geyer, widow of Gustav W. Geyer, have had the same under consideration and beg leave to submit the following report:

Gustav W. Geyer served as private of Company C, One hundred and eighty-seventh New York Volunteers, from September 19, 1864, to July 1, 1865. He applied for pension August 18, 1879, on account of rheumatism and deafness. The claim was not completed at time of his death, which occurred December 13, 1883, but was subsequently allowed and the pension paid to the widow. Her claim has been rejected on the ground that the injury to head, from the effects of which he died, was not chargeable to the soldier's military service.

Robert Willax and George Schank testify:

"They saw the soldier when he was run over and thrown against the curbstone by a horse attached to a buggy, December 7, 1883, near his house on Locust street, Buffalo, N. Y.; soldier was crossing the street and did not observe the approach of the buggy, and the driver called to him several times, but being too deaf, he did not hear the warning, and was knocked down. Affiants ran to his aid, picked him up, and aided him to his house. He was unconscious and never recovered. Had he not been deaf he could have heard the alarm and escaped death."

Dr. F. W. Bartlett, of Buffalo, N. Y., states:

"As attending physician of the soldier he endeavored to obtain all the information possible regarding the cause of the accident, and found that every effort was made to notify him of his danger, but that he paid no attention to the warnings given, and evidently did not hear them. Has no doubt that his deafness prevented his doing so—it was so great that he could not work in shops."

There is other testimony corroborative of above. While the action of the Pension Office in rejecting the widow's claim was proper under the rules governing the adjudication of pension claims, yet your committee are of opinion that had it not been for the disability contracted in the service soldier would have escaped the injury which resulted in his death, and therefore report favorably an accompanying bill and ask that it do pass.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

FRANCES P. VERNON.

Mr. FUNSTON called up the bill (H. R. 7912) for the relief of Frances P. Vernon.

The bill was read, as follows:

The report (by Mr. MORRILL) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 7912) granting a pension to Frances P. Vernon, widow of Richard B. Vernon (deceased), a private of Company M, Sixth Kansas Militia, having had the same under consideration, make the following report:

The application for pension, and letters and papers accompanying this bill, show that Richard B. Vernon, the husband of the applicant, was enrolled on the 9th day of October, 1864, at Mound City, Kans., and ordered into active service as private in Company M, Sixth Kansas Militia, at same date, and that he was killed by stragglers of Price's army while at his home on the 24th day of October, 1864.

His widow, Frances P. Vernon, made formal application for pension, which was rejected on the 19th day of February, 1868, for the reason that the soldier was not in line of duty as a soldier when killed.

The affidavit of A. W. Long, who was captain of the company of which Richard B. Vernon was a private, is as follows:

"That he was captain of Company M, Sixth Kansas State Militia, in the war of the rebellion, and was personally acquainted with Richard B. Vernon, who was a private in the same company in said regiment. That affiant was personally and intimately acquainted with the said Richard B. Vernon prior to his enlistment in the service aforesaid, and with his wife, who is making this application for pension. That in the month of October, 1864, while affiant's command was in camp at Big Blue, in Jackson County, Missouri, the said Richard B. Vernon (deceased) obtained a leave of absence for a few days to visit his wife and children, who resided about 50 miles down the Missouri line in Bates County, Missouri, on account of sickness in his family.

"That the said Richard B. Vernon, while at his home on said leave of absence, was shot down and killed in the presence of his family by stragglers belonging to General Price's army. Captain Long further states that his own father was shot down and killed on the same day by the same troops, and that he attended the funeral of his father, and at the graveyard saw the dead body of the said Richard B. Vernon."

The committee is of the opinion that the affidavit of Captain Long fully establishes the fact that the soldier was absent with leave; and while it can not be said that he was strictly in line of duty when killed, it can be said that he was acting in accord with the wishes and permission of his commanding officer, and that he was killed by the enemy because he was a soldier of the Government.

His widow was left with a family of six children, whom she cared for as best she could in her poverty; and now, at the age of sixty, she comes to Congress with what we believe to be a meritorious case, and therefore the committee recommend the passage of the bill.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

BENJAMIN T. BAKER.

Mr. GALLINGER called up the bill (S. 2825) granting an increase of pension to Benjamin T. Baker.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Benjamin T. Baker, late a quartermaster on the United States steamer Spuyten Duyvil in the United States Navy, and pay him at the rate of $72 per month, in lieu of that which he is now receiving.

The report (by Mr. GALLINGER) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2825) granting an increase of pension to Benjamin T. Baker, have had the same under consideration, and beg leave to submit the following report:

Benjamin T. Baker enlisted in Company H, First Regiment New York Engineers, January 27, 1862, and was discharged on surgeon's certificate of disability July 4, 1863, because of general disability and partial paralysis of both legs, from fatigue and exposure in ponton drill and in active service on Folly Island, South Carolina. He re-entered the Navy as quartermaster on the steamer Spuyten Duyvil, July 27, 1864, and was discharged March 13, 1865, because of chronic bronchitis and general debility. During that service he was also treated for chronic rheumatism and suffered from a strain of side from a fall received while assisting in raising an anchor.

Baker is now a pensioner at the rate of $24 per month on account of chronic bronchitis.

The last medical examination, November 7, 1887, shows as follows:

"A poorly nourished old man; muscles atrophied, soft and flabby; skin over abdomen hangs in folds; chest is flat, dullness on percussion over both lungs; rude respiration in all parts of lungs, with moist rales here and there; respiration shallow; heart's action very weak. Claimant is very feeble, and is unable to perform any manual labor, but his condition is in part due to old age."

Because of this opinion no higher rate of pension than heretofore stated will be granted by the Pension Office.

The pensioner is now entirely helpless, as known by the writer of this report. He has no means of support, and, together with his wife, a complete invalid, and a daughter, likewise an invalid, is supported and taken care of by another daughter, a widow, who, having met with severe financial losses a few years ago, is also dependent upon her own exertions for a livelihood.

From all the evidence before your committee we are of opinion that the pension now paid in this case is entirely insufficient for the care and maintenance of this poor and helpless soldier, whose disabilities are so well established as chargeable to his service, and that some relief should be granted. The bill is therefore returned, with the recommendation that it do pass, amended, however, by striking out the words "seventy-two," in line 6, and inserting therein instead the work "fifty."

The amendment of the committee was agreed to, and the bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

LYDIA ANN WILBUR.

Mr. GEST called up the bill (H. R. 8200) granting a pension to Lydia Ann Wilbur.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the name of Lydia Ann Wilbur, sister of John M. Wilbur, who was a soldier in Company A of the Seventy-seventh Regiment of Illinois Infantry Volunteers, in the war of the rebellion, and was killed in battle May 22, 1863, and pay to her a pension of —— per month, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws.

The amendment of the committee was read by the Clerk, as follows:

Strike out the words "of —— dollars per month," so it will read:

"And pay to her a pension subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws."

The report (by Mr. LANE) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 8200) granting a pension to Lydia Ann Wilber, have considered the same, and submit the following report:

John M. Wilber was a brother of the claimant. His mother died when he was a baby. His father remarried, and shortly after died. Benjamin Wilber was another brother, a few years older. Upon the death of their mother the care of these brothers fell upon Lydia, and she cared for them in their childhood and in their young manhood with the care of a mother.

Their father was a clergyman, with but little property, and what he had went to his widow, his second wife, upon his death. The children were left penniless. The claimant was always frail in health and strength, but she cared for and supported these boys by teaching school and other employment. They lived together until the boys entered the Union Army, mutually helping one another. The claimant is now fifty-four years old and in feeble health of both body and mind, and is dependent absolutely on friends for support, having no means whatever. While the boys were in the service they sent to her a portion of their wages for her support.

John M. Wilber was killed in battle in the assault upon Vicksburg, May 22, 1863, and Benjamin died in hospital at New Orleans while in the service. The death of these brothers completely prostrated the claimant, from which she has not recovered and there is no prospect that she ever will.

The proof shows clearly that the boys had stated many times to neighbors and friends that they would provide and care for their sister in the future.

They were both unmarried, and the claimant has never married. These facts are abundantly substantiated by numerous witnesses, almost all of whom have known the entire family since the childhood of these boys, and been their immediate neighbors.

E. E. Wallace, a resident of Warren County, Illinois, in which the claimant and her family resided, testifies:

"That he has known claimant since 1847, and knew Benjamin and John M. Wilber during their lives; that their mother died in their infancy, when John was about one year old and Benjamin a few years older; that claimant gave to them both the care and attention of a mother as long as they lived, enduring great labor and self-denial; that she is now and for a number of years has been in delicate health and is without property and dependent on others, and in too delicate health to care for herself properly."

Anne G. Phelps, of said county, testifies to the same substance as the preceding witness (Wallace), adding that she knew of the confidence of the claimant, that the boys would take care of her, and of the claimant's prostration for three years after their deaths.

R. Ogden, now of Bedford, Iowa, swears to about the same state of facts.

Edwin Bundy and C. L. Bundy, now of Bedford, Iowa, swear to about the same.

Eugene Ogden, of Monmouth, Warren County, also corroborates these statements.

Franklin Ogden and Zephaniah Lewis, now of Knox County, Illinois, adjoining Warren County, swear they knew these boys and claimant from their childhood; of the death of their mother and father, leaving them penniless; of the care of Lydia for her brothers; that her physical and mental health broke down; that previous to their enlistment the boys helped to support her.

Narcissa C. Ogden, of Warren County, swears to the same facts, and adds that she knows—

"That the said brothers did intend to provide for their said sister, and did send her a part of their soldiers' wages; that John M. Wilber directed his guardian, who was deponent's nephew, to pay to his said sister all his means, and that said guardian did so."

Leander Chamberlin, Urania Chamberlin, and Orsan H. Patterson, of Henry County, Illinois, swear to their personal knowledge, for many years, of the labor and care of claimant for her brothers and of her destitution since their deaths.

E. P. Phelps swears to his knowledge of the care by claimant of her brothers from their infancy, and of her poverty and ill health since their death.

Rachel A. Bilden, Huldah G. Calkins, L. W. Hardenbrook, Harriet O. Spicerman, and F. D. Ogden swear that claimant cared for and supported these boys in childhood; that her health became broken down and still is; that she has no means of support, and is unable to support herself; that John particularly promised and intended to support his sister, and their deaths cut off her only means of support.

Your committee recommend the passage of this bill.

The amendment of the committee was agreed to, and the bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ISAAC HURD.

Mr. HALL called up the bill (H. R. 9935) to increase the pension of Isaac Hurd.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, directed to increase the pension of Isaac Hurd, a veteran of the war of 1812, Vermont Militia, from $8 per month, the amount now allowed him, to $30 per month.

The report (by Mr. HENDERSON, of North Carolina) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 9935) granting an increase of pension to Isaac Hurd, have considered the same, and report as follows:

The claimant was a private in Captain Strait's company of Vermont Militia from September 17, 1812, to November 30, 1812. He now draws a pension of $8 per month.

He is ninety-five years of age, is in a helpless condition, of weak mind, and has no income of any kind except his small pension. He has a daughter of sixty years, who is also in feeble health and destitute circumstances. About thirty of his neighbors request that he be given a larger pension.

Your committee recommend that the bill do pass, amended by inserting the words "Vermont Militia" after the word "twelve," in line 5.

The amendment of the committee was agreed to, and the bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

HANNIBAL KIMBALL.

Mr. HAUGEN called up the bill (H. R. 10245) granting an increase of pension to Hannibal Kimball.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the limitations and provisions of the pension laws, the name of Hannibal Kimball, a soldier of the war of 1812, at the rate of $40 per month, in lieu of the amount now received by him under the law.

The report (by Mr. BLISS) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 10245) granting a pension increase to Hannibal Kimball, have considered the same, and report as follows:

The claimant served in Captain Pratt's company of the Twenty-first United States Infantry in the war of 1812, from March 10, 1813, to March 10, 1815. He is in receipt of a pension at the rate of $8 per month. He is ninety-one years of age; his wife is seventy-two years of age. The claimant is very feeble, almost helpless, and unable to dress himself alone. He has no property, except a few acres of land without buildings, which afford him an income of $25 per annum. His son, who has been the chief means of his support, has met with reverses in business, and has a large family of his own to support.

The facts are established by the testimony of several neighbors and by the certificate of the county judge, county clerk, circuit court clerk, county treasurer, register of deeds, and postmaster, all residents of Clark County, Wisconsin.

Your committee in similar cases have allowed an increase to $30 per month.

They recommend the passage of the bill, amended, however, by striking out the word "forty," in line 7, and inserting in lieu thereof the word "thirty."

The amendment of the committee was agreed to, and the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

MRS. ELLA M. GROVER.

Mr. HERMANN called up the bill (S. 2254) to increase the pension of Mrs. Ella M. Grover.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Mrs. Ella M. Grover, widow of Cuvier Grover, late colonel of the First United States Cavalry, and pay her a pension at the rate of $50 a month in lieu of that she is now receiving.

Mr. CHEADLE. The gentleman had better withdraw it, as I will raise the question of no quorum.

Mr. HERMANN. I ask for the reading of the report so we may know what the facts in the case are, and why the gentleman objects to it.

The Clerk proceeded with the reading of the report.

Mr. MACDONALD. I move that the further reading of the report be dispensed with. If the point of no quorum is to be made it is a mere waste of time.

Mr. HERMANN. I ask for the reading of the report so the House may know what the facts are and how just this case is.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oregon insists upon the reading of the report, and the Clerk will proceed to read it.

The report (by Mr. SAWYER) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2254) to increase the pension of Mrs. Ella M. Grover, have had the same under consideration and beg leave to submit the following facts:

The bill proposes to increase the pension of the widow of Cuvier Grover, who died June 6, 1885, while holding the rank of colonel of First Regiment United States Cavalry. She is now a pensioner at the rate of $30 per month, the highest rate allowable under the general pension laws.

Cuvier Grover entered the service in 1846. At the breaking out of the late war he held the rank of captain, but was soon promoted to brigadier-general of volunteers. In that rank he served with the Army of the Potomac in the Virginia Peninsular campaign. Took part in the siege of Yorktown and battle of Williamsburgh. For gallant services in the latter he was breveted lieutenant-colonel in the regular Army. For like services in the battle of Fair Oaks he was breveted colonel. General Grover was at the battles of Savage Station, Glendale, and Malvern Hill. In the Northern Virginia campaign of 1862 he took part in the action at Bristoe Station and second Bull Run. From December 30, 1862, to July, 1864, he commanded a division of the Nineteenth Corps in the Department of the Gulf and participated in the occupation of Baton Rouge and Port Hudson, where he commanded the right wing of the besieging army.

From August to December, 1864, he commanded a division of the Nineteenth Corps in the Shenandoah campaign, and on October 16 he was brevetted major-general of volunteers for gallantry at the battles of Winchester and Fisher's Hill. He was severely wounded in the battle of Cedar Creek on the same day. From January to June, 1865, General Grover was in command of the district of Savannah, and in March, 1865, he was brevetted brigadier-general and major-general in the Regular Army. From the close of the war until his death General Grover served most of the time on the frontier post.

The immediate cause of his death was hemorrhage of the lungs arising from pulmonary abscess, after having been a sufferer from nervous prostration for many years, unquestionably due to his long and faithful field services during the late war, and great exposures to which he was subjected at different times, as shown by the testimony of members of his staff and medical officers of the Army. In particular was he a great sufferer from facial neuralgia due to extraordinary exposure during the Banks campaign.

Mrs. Grover has a very limited income, with three small children to provide for. The long and gallant services of her husband heretofore referred to, which are made more conspicuous by the testimonials of his superior officers, on file with your committee, would seem to entitle her to the relief asked for, which Congress, in many other cases less meritorious, has so cheerfully granted.

For these reasons the accompanying bill is returned with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. CHEADLE. I object to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. HERMANN. I wish to call attention to one point in this case different from that in any other to which the gentleman has referred.

Mr. CHEADLE. For the sake of argument I am willing to admit all the gentleman has said, but I wish to say to that gentleman and to the committee, and through them to the country, that when a claimant is receiving the highest pension known to the law they ought to be satisfied with it.

Mr. HERMANN. The gentleman has forgotten one fact stated in that report, and that is that General Grover's rank in the Army was that of a brevet brigadier-general and also major-general. Does not that make this an exception to the cases to which the gentleman formerly objected?

Mr. CHEADLE. I desire to be heard briefly in answer to what the gentleman has said, showing the ground of my objection.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I demand the regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. The regular order is proceeding. The gentleman from Oregon is entitled to the floor.

Mr. SENEY. Regular order.

Mr. HERMANN. I have desired to call the attention of the gentleman from Indiana to the fact that this is a peculiar and an exceptional case. I have a right to present this case, and I insist upon my right.

Mr. SENEY. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that objection having been made to the consideration of this bill, the gentleman from Oregon is not entitled to the floor. Why, then, take up the time of the committee?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Ohio that the gentleman from Oregon is entitled to the floor and that an objection can not be made at this time. When the gentleman from Oregon yields the floor the Chair will submit the question to the committee, at which time it will be proper, if any gentleman desires to do so, to make an objection.

Mr. HERMANN. I have called the attention of the gentleman from Indiana to a peculiar point which I claim is embodied in this case, and which should merit his kind indulgence and make it an exception to cases of this class to which he has heretofore objected. The fact is that General Grover was brevetted a brigadier-general and a major-general for gallant services on the field of battle, and he died a colonel in the regular Army, for which his widow has been receiving a small pension heretofore. She is in necessitous circumstances, with three small children to support. The gallant military career of her husband is well known to all students of history, and I need not mention it now. He was a grand man, a brave soldier, a true patriot, and won his epaulets upon the most bloody fields of the late war. He leaves his widow and little children to his country. They have but little other independent income than the very inadequate sum now received. They appeal to the Government their loved protector so gallantly fought and bled to save. But, Mr. Chairman, rather than delay the passage of other bills to which no objection is made through the committee to-night, and in view of the fact that objection has been made to this case, I will trust to securing favorable action of the House on it at some future time, and ask unanimous consent now that it may be passed over informally, retaining its place upon the Calendar.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection that order will be made.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

RANSOM RILEY.

Mr. HUNTER. I call up for present consideration the bill (H. R. 9182) granting a pension to Ransom Riley.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and dir-cted to place on the pension-roll the name of Ransom Riley, late private of Company G, Fifth Regiment Kentucky Volunteer Cavalry, at the rate of $8 per month.

The report (by Mr. HUNTER) was read, as follows:

It appears that claimant was enrolled at Burkesville, Cumberland County, Kentucky, on the 3d day of October, 1861, as a private in Company G, Fifth Regiment Kentucky Volunteer Cavalry, and while serving with that command at Columbia, Ky., in January, 1862, he was sent to hospital near that place for treatment for rheumatism and lung trouble contracted in the line of duty, and remained there until the 10th day of February, 1862, when he was granted a sick furlough by the surgeon in charge and permitted to go to his home in Cumberland County, Kentucky. A few days after reaching home he was captured by the Confederate forces and taken as a prisoner of war to Salisbury, N. C., where he was confined until June, 1862, when he was exchanged.

He was so disabled on his return home from prison from the effects of the rheumatism and lung trouble heretofore stated, and the confinement in prison, that he was unfit for further military duty, and did not, therefore, rejoin his regiment to be mustered into the United States service.

He is still a great sufferer from the causes above stated, but can not obtain relief through the Pension Bureau on account of his failure to be mustered into the service. He therefore appeals to the generosity of Congress and asks that his name be placed on the pension-roll.

In view of the foregoing facts your committee feel that this is a meritorious case, and report the bill back with a favorable recommendation.

Amend by striking out all after the word "cavalry," in the sixth line, and add "subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws."

The amendment recommended by the committee was adopted.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

MRS. MARY R. ARMSTRONG.

Mr. JACKSON. I call up the bill (S. 1070) granting a pension to Mrs. Mary R. Armstrong.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Mrs. Mary R. Armstrong, mother of George R. Armstrong, late a member of Company L, Eleventh Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteers.

The report (by Mr. LYNCH) was read, as follows:

That we adopt the Senate report, which is as follows, and recommend the passage of the bill:

"George R. Armstrong, son of the claimant, enlisted September 25, 1861, as a private in Company L, Eleventh Regiment Pennsylvania Cavalry, and remained in the United States service until his discharge, August 13, 1865.

"The claimant alleges that the decedent contracted chills and fever on the eastern shore of Virginia in 1864 and 1865; that he never fully recovered therefrom, and that his death, on August 19, 1868, at Fort Bridger, Wyo., was due to that disease.

"No medical evidence is produced showing the contraction of the disease, owing to the fact that decedent's company was on detached duty at the time, in Accomack County, Virginia, and therefore he was not treated by the regimental surgeon, but by Drs. West and Parmer, resident physicians, whose present whereabouts she can not trace. The physician who attended him after his discharge is now deceased. Nor can she find the physician who attended him at Fort Bridger, Wyo., where he died.

"She produces, however, the affidavits of five members of his company (including a lieutenant), showing his ill-health from chills and fever, or malaria, contracted while on detached duty; and showing, moreover, that he was in such an enfeebled condition at the time of his discharge as to render it necessary for some of his companions to escort him home. The affiants state also that the decedent enjoyed good health at the time of his enlistment.

"Other affidavits filed in the case establish the fact that decedent's disability continued after his discharge, and that he went West with a view to the restoration of his health.

"Mary R. Armstrong, the claimant, is now seventy-one years old, and has been a widow since April 23, 1884.

"In view of these facts, your committee recommend the passage of the accompanying bill."

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

PHILIP THOMPSON.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. I call up for present consideration the bill (H. R. 10210) to increase the pension of Philip Thompson.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to increase the pension of Philip Thompson, late a private of Company D, Seventy-first Regiment of Indiana Volunteers, from $10 per month to $72 per month, as now specified in pension certificate No. 56297.

The report (by Mr. MATSON) was read, as follows:

The claimant is pensioned for gunshot wound of left knee. He made application to the Pension Bureau for increase on account of injury to right knee and heart disease, and the same was rejected on the ground of insufficient evidence to establish incurrence of said disabilities in line of duty.

As to heart disease, John and Barbara Lock testify—

"That they have known claimant since 1863, and that after his return from the Army he was always sickly and not able to perform labor. They lived with him and have observed that he was sick and confined to his bed most of the time. He always complained of pain in heart and in the left breast. He was compelled to walk very slow, otherwise he was taken with sharp pains in his heart. He did not suffer so much from his affliction during the first years they lived with him, but during the last years he suffered very much, and was confined to his house most of the time."

Benjamin L. Tribble, of same company and regiment—

"Has known claimant before and since the war. Knows that claimant was sound and healthy at time of enlistment. Since his discharge he has seen him very frequently, and he has always complained of heart disease which greatly unfits him for manual labor."

Asst. Surg. G. Schmidth states—

"That he knew claimant in 1863; treated him for injury to knee, and at the same time he complained of pain in the heart, and as I treated him at Indianapolis for rheumatism I took the same treatment, and as rheumatism at all times will have certain effects on the heart, I made my diagnosis accordingly."

The claimant states in his application for increase that he received the injury to his right knee cap by being run over by an ammunition wagon at the battle of Richmond, Ky. There seems to be no positive evidence, in fact, no evidence except claimant's own statement, as to injury to right knee. There is an injury to the right knee, and a number of his neighbors testify that it is their belief that said injury was incurred in the service as stated.

It seems to the committee that the incurrence of heart disease in line of duty is sufficiently established to warrant recommending favorable action on the bill. We therefore recommend that the bill be amended to read as follows: Strike out "Thompson" wherever it occurs in said bill and insert "Thomas;" strike out all after the word "volunteers," in line 6, and insert " for injury to right knee and heart disease, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws;" and when so amended we recommend the passage of the bill.

The amendments recommended by the committee were adopted.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

TEMPY M. JOHNSTON.

Mr. JOSEPH. I ask present consideration of the bill (H. R. 9169) granting a pension to Tempy M. Johnston.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Tempy M. Johnston, widow of John Johnston, late sergeant Company B, Eleventh Regiment Kentucky Volunteers.

The report (by Mr. HUNTER) was read, as follows:

This claimant, Mrs. Johnston, has been twice married. Her first husband, John G. Allen, was a private in Company K, Eleventh Kentucky Volunteer Infantry, and died in service of wounds received at the battle of Stone River. The claimant was pensioned as his widow from the date of his death up to October 18, 1868, when she married John Johnston.

Johnston was also a soldier in the war of the rebellion, having served as a sergeant in Company B, Eleventh Kentucky Volunteer Infantry, and at the battle of Atlanta, Ga., August 6, 1864, he received a gun-shot wound of right arm, which necessitated amputation. Mr. Johnston was a pensioner for the loss of the arm, and at the time of his death received $24 per month. He died November 26, 1885. Concerning the cause of his death Dr. W. H. Yost testifies as follows:

"I knew him previous to his enlistment and that he was healthy. He was wounded in the arm in 1864, for which he had his arm amputated. He came home with gangrene on the stump. After he recovered from gangrene he had scurvy for quite awhile. In 1880 he was attacked with diabetes, for which I attended him up to his death."

The widow's claim was rejected by the office on the ground that the death of the soldier Johnston was not due to his military service. Dr. David G. Craig also testifies in the claim:

"That during the last sickness of Johnston he visited him frequently as a neighbor, and dressed him after his death. That for several days prior to his death the stump of the arm was enlarged to twice the size of the natural arm, and was of a purple color and indicated mortification."

Several other affiants testify to this condition of the right arm just preceding death, and to its troubling him frequently for years previous.

While it is impossible to state that the diseased arm did or did not occasion the death cause, yet, there being a doubt in the matter, it is proper that the benefit thereof should be given to the soldier's widow. Moreover, the pension ought to be restored to her which she drew for the death in service of her first husband, and which she forfeited by her remarriage to the soldier Johnston. The honorable Commissioner of Pensions has recommended restoration of pension to a widow who had been deprived of it by a remarriage, in cases similar to the one under consideration.

Your committee recommend the passage of the bill.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

MARY M. SHATTUCK.

Mr. KERR. I ask to call up the bill (S. 3076) granting a pension to Mary M. Shattuck.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Mary M. Shattuck, widow of Merritt Shattuck, late a private in Company H, Thirty-fifth Regiment Iowa Infantry.

The report (by Mr. SAWYER) was read, as follows:

The facts and evidence appearing in the Senate report, hereto attached and made a part hereof, satisfy the committee that this is a meritorious case, and they report favorably and recommend that the bill do pass.

[Senate Report No. 1462, Fiftieth Congress, first session.]

The petitioner is the widow of Merritt Shattuck, late a private in Company H, Thirty-fifth Regiment Iowa Infantry. He was enrolled on the 4th of August, 1862, and was mustered out August 10, 1865, having served three continuous years. He was pensioned for varicocele and general debility at the rate of $4 a month, and at the time of his death he had a pending claim for increase. The widow filed a claim in 1883 for pension for herself and children, which was rejected on the ground that he died of pneumonia, a disease not shown to be due to his military service.

The case, as it comes from the Pension Office, is very imperfectly briefed, but in the opinion of the committee there is ample testimony in the file to show that the soldier went into the service a sound man, came out of it broken down, diseased, debilitated, and that death was a result of his army life.

The record reports show that he was sick and in hospital at different times with fever and diarrhea. The soldier claimed that he had rupture, which was due to hard marching.

Dr. R. M. Youngkin, who was soldier's family physician, testifies:

"Prior to and at the date of enlistment he was a sound, able-bodied man, especially free from rupture or any disabling cause of the kind. Given from personal knowledge."

Dr. Cobb, late surgeon of the Thirty-fifth Iowa Regiment, testifies:

"Treated said Shattuck for bilious intermittent fever, attended with diarrhea. He never was robust after the fever, and was troubled with diarrhea more or less during the remainder of his term in the service. Was able for duty only a part of the time. He now, November, 1880, is not robust, and has varicocele of left scrotum and extending up the cord, which troubles him very much."

Martin Rice, an orderly sergeant of Company H, swears that in the spring of 1864 Shattuck, on the march up Red River, gave out; that the hard marching and weight he had to carry caused a rupture. This from his personal knowledge.

Benjamin Hill, another comrade, swears to the same statement, and says he was ruptured in the left side.

Two other comrades, Godfrey and Ferguson, swear to the rupture and the cause.

Dr. Youngkin says his disability was such as to disqualify him for labor a greater portion of the time.

Joseph Owen and C. H. Easttack testify in 1882 that they knew the soldier from the time he came home; that he was debilitated, and a sufferer from varicocele to an extent to disqualify him for manual labor.

Two other neighbors, Rice and Chapnew, swear that he had rupture when he came home, and that he was generally broken down. They knew this from seeing him daily and from being well acquainted with him before.

Dr. Forlet, who is an official examiner, and who examined him in 1880, says his disability is varicocele of more than ordinary severity, that he suffers all the inconveniences belonging to the same. Its volume is that of a hen's egg and extends as far up as the external ring of the inguinal canal.

The examining board at Cedar Rapids, Iowa, say: "We find a varicose condition of vessels of spermatic cord, left side," and close with this brief and unsatisfactory statement.

This testimony given in support of the soldier's claim for invalid pension establishes the fact of the incurrence of the worst form of varicocele, which some of his comrades called "rupture," and of the serious and permanent impairment of his health.

In the widow's claim there is evidence connecting his disabilities with his death. Dr. Youngkin says he knew the soldier from his boyhood; was his father's family physician; always considered him healthy; treated him after his return from the Army for several years for varicocele and twice for pneumonia; always considered his lungs very weak; he suffered from a cough; was pale and emaciated; treated him for chronic diarrhea.

Dr. Skinner often saw him during the three or four years prior to his death. In April, 1883, found him sick with catarrhal pneumonia, affecting the tissues of both lungs; constantly attended him to the time of his death. His general appearance prior to his last illness indicated an impoverished condition of the system, and had always regarded him as suffering from pulmonary disease, though he did not prescribe for him or make an examination prior to his last illness.

Isaac B. Johnson and E. F. Johnson, of Mechanicsville, Iowa, testify that they were well acquainted with the soldier at the time of his discharge. He was brought to their house weak and poorly; had been sick for some time. He was much debilitated with chronic diarrhea and tendency to weak lungs; never recovered from affection of lungs and weakened condition. Soon after his return home he had an attack of pneumonia, and required the best of care. He was never restored to health; had pain in the lungs and side on the least exposure. When affiants heard of his death from pneumonia they were not surprised, for they had personal knowledge of his continuous bad health.

From a careful examination of the evidence filed the committee are convinced that it furnishes a connected history of the incurrence, progress, and fatal ending of the soldier's disabilities. It is shown that he had chronic diarrhea, varicocele, lung affection—diseases that caused constant suffering, and the progressive effects of which may consistently and properly be connected with his death. The testimony of the physicians, official and lay, it may be admitted, is lacking in detail; but with the honest statements of the affiants, who knew the man, there is sufficient to justify the admission of the claim by the Commissioner of Pensions.

The committee report the accompanying bill for the relief of the widow and recommend its passage.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

HENRY MITCHELL YOUNGBLOOD.

Mr. KILGORE. I call up for present consideration the bill (H. R. 10907) granting a pension to Henry Mitchell Youngblood.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the name of Henry Mitchell Youngblood, who served in Captain Richard Sloan's company, First Regiment Drafted Georgia Militia, Indian war, 1836, under the name of Michael Youngblood, and pay him a pension at the rate of $8 per month.

The report (by Mr. BLISS) was read, as follows:

The claimant, under the name of Mitchell (or Michael) Youngblood, as shown by the report of the War Department, served in Capt. Richard Sloan's company, First Regiment Drafted Georgia Militia, from June 4 to July 16, 1836, and was paid for one month and twenty-five days. The claimant and his wife are each seventy-one years of age, invalids, and in destitute condition. He should have a service pension as a survivor of the Indian wars.

Your committee recommend the passage of the bill amended by striking out the word "eight," in line 9, and inserting in lieu thereof the word "thirty."

During the reading of the report,

Mr. GALLINGER said: This is evidently a meritorious claim; and I ask that the further reading of the report be dispensed with.

Mr. MACDONALD. I object——

The CHAIRMAN. The report is quite brief.

The Clerk resumed and concluded the reading of the report, as above.

Mr. MACDONALD. I did not want to object to the request to dispense with the reading of the report.

Mr. KILGORE. Do you mean to object to the bill?

Mr. MACDONALD. I object to the amount fixed in the bill. I propose to do in this case what the gentleman from Texas proposed in one of the preceding cases. Inasmuch as this bill has been introduced for $8 a month, and the committee recommend $30, I propose to amend it by making it $20 a month.

Mr. KILGORE. We accept that.

Mr. MACDONALD. That is business.

The amendment was adopted.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

JOHN DAUPER.

Mr. LAIRD. I call up the bill (H. R. 10342) granting a pension to John Dauper.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the limitations and provisions of the pension laws, the name of John Dauper, late of Company I, Eighteenth Regiment of Ohio Volunteer Infantry.

The report (by Mr. THOMPSON, of Ohio) was read, as follows:

John Dauper was a corporal in Company I of the Eighteenth Regiment of Ohio Volunteer Infantry. He enlisted April 24, 1861, for three months, and was mustered out August 28, 1861. He applied for pension because of disability resulting from diarrhea and disease of stomach, liver, kidneys, and bladder, contracted in said service in the line of his duty. The examiner who had charge of the case recommended its admission for chronic diarrhea and disease of kidneys and bladder, and its rejection for disease of the liver; but the office rejected his claim, because, as they allege, "of claimant's inability to furnish satisfactory evidence that he contracted any of the alleged diseases while in service, there being no record thereof; and it appears that he can not furnish medical evidence of the existence thereof while in the service or until some years after discharged."

Now, while there is no record or medical evidence to show the existence of the alleged diseases while in service, yet it is clearly shown by the affidavit of his second lieutenant, John Andres, and by the affidavits of two comrades, Vincent Ratcliff and Cleveland Lackey, that while in camp near Parkersburgh, W. Va., on or about the 10th day of June, 1861, during a rainy night, the soldier, for want of tents, was compelled to lie all night on the bare ground, and in consequence of this exposure contracted a severe cold, which was followed by diarrhea; that he was sick from that time forward, and complained of diarrhea, his stomach, kidneys, and bladder; that they have known him from that time until the present, and that he has been sick and disabled in the manner stated from the time said disease was contracted as aforesaid until the present time. There is ample testimony to show that he was a sound, healthy, able-bodied man when he enlisted, and ample testimony, medical and lay, to show that since his return from the service he has been continuously afflicted with disease in the manner stated. We have no doubt that he is disabled in a pensionable degree, and that his disability was incurred in said service in the line of his duty, and we therefore recommend the passage of the bill.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

SARAH A. MASON.

Mr. LANE. I ask consideration of the bill (H. R. 10121) granting a pension to Sarah A. Mason.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Sarah A. Mason, widow of John Mason, late private of Company D, Forty-ninth Regiment of Illinois Volunteers.

The report (by Mr. LANE) was read, as follows:

The committee beg leave to report that they have considered this case and find that the claimant was the wife of the soldier, John Mason, late a private in Company D, Forty-ninth Regiment Illinois Volunteers; that the said John Mason was taken prisoner by the Confederate government and was imprisoned in Andersonville prison, where he died some time in 1863; that after his death the claimant drew a pension as the widow of said soldier up to March, 1870, when she was dropped from the pension-roll for the reason that she had remarried.

The facts in regard to such remarriage the committee find to be that the said widow was drawing $8 per month for pension, which was not sufficient to support her, and that one Moses Bray induced her to marry him under the false and fraudulent representations and statements that he was a man of property and was amply able to support her, and relying on such statements she was induced to marry him, and after she was married to him she found that she was deceived, and such statements as to his property were false and fraudulent, and that in a very short time after such marriage he left her, carrying away with him some of her little property, which he sold and converted to his own use and never returned to her and never provided her with a support.

The committee find from the evidence in this case that the claimant was fraudulently induced to enter into said second marriage, and that the said Moses Bray at the time of said marriage did not intend to live with her, and that he has since deserted her, and that she has secured a decree of divorce from said Bray on the ground of fraud and desertion, and that she is now sixty years of age, unable to work because of disease, and has no property to provide her with support and has no person liable to support her, and if she does not get relief here she will become a public charge on the community for her support.

On a full consideration of this case the committee recommend that this bill do pass.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

WILLIAM F. PIKE.

Mr. LEHLBACH. I ask consideration of the bill (S. 3166) granting a pension to William F. Pike.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of William F. Pike, late of Company H, Thirteenth Regiment United States Infantry.

The report (by Mr. MORRILL) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, having had under consideration the bill (S. 3166) granting a pension to William F. Pike, submit the following report:

The report of the Senate committee is adopted, and the passage of the bill is recommended.

SENATE REPORT.

William F. Pike, the claimant under this bill, enlisted in Company H, Thirteenth Regiment United States Infantry, July 2, 1866, and was discharged July 27, 1867, at Camp Cook, Montana Territory, on a surgeon's certificate of disability, because of "incipient phthisis pulmonalis."

He made application for pension October 6, 1879, alleging—

"That at Camp Cook, Montana Territory, July, 1867, he was detailed to carry off adobes used in building quarters, etc.; sustained an injury something like a rupture on left side of abdomen above groin, and was injured just above left hip-joint."

The claim was rejected by the Commissioner of Pensions, December 15, 1887, on the ground—

"That record evidence and a special examination fail to show origin of claimant's disability in the service and line of duty."

The records of the War Department show no evidence of the alleged disability.

The claimant was eighteen years of age at enlistment. His soundness at this time is well established. William B. Ross, C. C. Martin, Richard Branigan, Joseph Veil, Simon Moeller, and Thomas Ross, comrades, all swear to incurrence of the disabilities as alleged by claimant.

The testimony showing continuance since discharge is full and complete, showing the inability of claimant to perform manual labor more than one-half the time.

The board of examining surgeons at Leavenworth, Kans., under date of June 28, 1882, report "no rupture," and make no rating for "injury to back." He was further examined by the board at Kansas City, July 2, 1884. They make no rating for alleged disabilities, but rate him C sixteen-eighteenths for disease of lungs, etc. H. F. Bender, special examiner, reports—

"That in his opinion the disability was contracted, as alleged, in line of duty, and that he is greatly disabled thereby, and has been ever since his discharge. * * * I do not believe it is really essential to investigate the case any further. Prior soundness, origin, and continuance are shown in this report, and I recommend admission."

W. S. Mayer, special examiner—

"Is of the opinion the claim is one of doubtful merit."

* * * * * * *

J. G. Townsend, special examiner, gives the opinion—

"That claimant was injured in the way which he claims, and that the case is probably a meritorious one, and recommend further examination."

A. H. Sweeter, special examiner, concludes his report by saying:

"From the evidence submitted I believe this claim to be meritorious; and believing further that, notwithstanding all minor discrepancies, it has been proven with reasonable sufficiency, I respectfully recommend its admission."

Your committee concur in this conclusion, and recommend the passage of the bill.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

BENJAMIN FRANKLIN.

Mr. LIND. I have a constituent here who had the misfortune to lose both arms and both legs. There is not a parallel case. He is now drawing a pension of $72 a month, and the committee this morning amended the bill so as to increase the allowance to $100 a month. The report has not been printed. If any one desires to object on that account I wish he would signify it now, because I do not want to consume the time of the committee.

Mr. KILGORE. I object.

Mr. LIND. I desire to say to the gentleman that this man has lost both arms and legs, and is almost blind.

Mr. MACDONALD. This is a meritorious case.

Mr. KILGORE. Did he lose them both in the war?

Mr. LIND. He lost them in the Indian war in Minnesota.

Mr. KILGORE. I withdraw my objection.

The bill was read, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 5193) granting an increase of pension to Benjamin Franklin.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Benjamin Franklin, late of Company H, Second Regiment of Minnesota Cavalry, and pay him a pension of $150 per month, in lieu of the pension of $72 per month heretofore granted, and which he is now receiving for loss of both legs and both arms.

Mr. LIND. The committee recommend an amendment to strike out $150 and insert $100. I will print the report to-morrow.

The amendment was agreed to; and the bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

JOSEPH LINCOLN YOUNG.

Mr. LODGE. I call up for consideration the bill (H. R. 2474) granting a pension to Joseph Lincoln Young.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Joseph Lincoln Young, son of Joseph Young, late a private in Third Maine Volunteers, for the pension formerly received by him as the minor child of a soldier who died in service.

The report (by Mr. FRENCH) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2474) granting a pension to Joseph Lincoln Young, have had the same under consideration, and beg leave to submit the following report:

The beneficiary named in the bill is the child of Joseph Young, who died August 21, 1864, at Andersonville prison, while a private of Company H, Seventeenth Maine Volunteers, to which command he was transferred from Company H, Third Maine Volunteers.

His widow drew pension until her death, January 20, 1868, whereupon his minor children were placed upon the pension-roll, and continued to receive pension until November 6, 1878, on which date the youngest, Joseph Lincoln, became sixteen years of age.

It appears from the evidence before your committee that Joseph Lincoln Young is incapable of taking care of himself by reason of a mild type of insanity, and that he is dependent upon others for support. The probate court of Essex County, Massachusetts, has declared him insane, and appointed a guardian.

Congress having on many occasions liberally responded to the requests for relief in this class of cases, your committee feel warranted in returning the accompanying bill with the recommendation that it do pass, amended, however, by striking out all after the word "private" in line 7, and insert therein instead the words "of Company H, Seventeenth Regiment Maine Volunteers, at the rate of $18 per month, payable to his legally constituted guardian."

The amendment was agreed to, and the bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ARLINGTON M. HARRINGTON.

Mr. LYMAN. I call up for consideration the bill (H. R. 3152) for the relief of Arlington M. Harrington.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Arlington M. Harrington, late a private in Company B, Sixteenth Regiment Kentucky Volunteer Infantry, in Mexican war, at the rate of $12 per month, in lieu of the pension he now receives.

The report (by Mr. BLISS) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 3152) granting a pension to Arlington M. Harrington, have considered the same, and report as follows:

The claimant served for a period of a year and three months in the Mexican war in Company B, Sixteenth United States Infantry. He is in receipt of a service pension of $8 per month under the act of January 29, 1887. He desires his pension to be increased to $12 per month on account of his disabled condition. About ten years ago he applied for pension, claiming that he contracted a disease of heart and Bright's disease of the kidneys while in Mexico. His claim was rejected because he could not find comrades and officers who remembered his diseases. The records show that he was sick in January and February, 1848, and he shows by the testimony of reliable witnesses that he has been an invalid ever since 1848. For several years he has been dependent upon the county in which he lives for part subsistence.

Your committee are of the opinion that an exception should be made in his case, and his reasonable request for increase be granted.

The passage of the bill is recommended.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

MIGHILL H. PATTEN.

Mr. MACDONALD. I call up for consideration the bill (H. R. 10672) granting a pension to Mighill H. Patten.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to place upon the pension-roll the name of Mighill H. Patten, late of Captain Hereford's company, First Regiment Maine State Militia, and now a resident of Waterford, Minn., subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws.

The report (by Mr. BLISS) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 10672) granting a pension to Mighill H. Patten, have considered the same, and report as follows:

The claimant served in Capt. James Huxford's company of light infantry (drafted), of Maine, called into actual service by the State for the protection of the northeastern frontier. His term of service extended from February 20 to April 25, 1839, and he was detached to First Regiment, First Brigade, Third Division, commanded by Maj. Gen. Isaac Hudsdon.

This command was called into service by the governor of Maine to repel a threatened military invasion from New Brunswick into the territory of Maine. The State was reimbursed for its expenses incurred in the campaign by act of Congress, and the rolls of the drafted and enrolled militia turned over to the War Department of the General Government.

The full circumstances of the use of the troops on the northeastern frontier of Maine are given in Senate Report 419, Twenty-sixth Congress, first session, and that report states that the exigency contemplated by the Constitution had arisen to warrant the governor of Maine in calling upon the militia force of the State to defend the frontier, exposed as it was to an immediate attack.

The claimant filed his claim before the Pension Bureau for pension, but it was rejected on the ground that the company was not mustered into the military service of the United States.

The claimant was allowed a land-warrant for his services in said campaign.

The period of service was prior to the war with Mexico, and your committee are of the opinion that a service pension should be granted to the claimant. They therefore recommend the passage of the bill, amended, however, by changing the word "Hereford's," in line 5 of the bill, to "Huxford's;" and also by striking out, in lines 7 and 8, the words "subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws" and inserting in lieu thereof the words "and to pay him a pension at the rate of $8 per month."

The amendments were agreed to; and the bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

JOSEPH WELSH.

Mr. MAISH. I ask consideration of the bill (H. R. 9975) granting a pension to Joseph Welsh.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, instructed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the limitations and provisions of the pension laws, the name of Joseph Welsh, of York, Pa., father of Albertus Welsh, J. Franklin Welsh, and Howard H. Welsh, all of whom are now deceased, soldiers in the Union Army in the war of the rebellion, on whom the said Joseph Welsh was dependent for support during the said war.

The report (by Mr. LYNCH) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 9975) granting a pension to Joseph Welsh, submit the following report:

Joseph Welsh had four sons, all of whom served in the Union Army during the war of the rebellion, one also having served his country in our war with Mexico.

Albertus Welsh, his oldest son, died early in the war, whilst in the service, from disease contracted in the service.

J. Franklin Welsh, another son, was wounded at the battle of Winchester, and was disabled for life. He died about five years ago.

Howard H. Welsh, also a son, contracted a disease in the service from the effects of which he was partially disabled until he died, about ten years ago.

Edward P. Welsh, another son, died in 1882.

Two of his sons lived with their father and mainly supported him and their mother at the time when they entered the Army, and they all contributed to his support whilst they were in the service, and afterwards until they died. Joseph Welsh's wife died about six months ago.

Joseph Welsh is now eighty-three years old, and is utterly bereft of those on whom he could lean for support in his old age, all of his children being dead. He states in this affidavit "that he is now in a destitute condition and has nothing but what is given him by charitable friends."

It is proposed that the bill be amended by inserting the words, in line 10, after the end of the sentence, as follows: "and pay the said Joseph Welsh a pension of $25 per month."

As thus amended the bill is reported favorably, with the recommendation that it do pass.

The amendment was agreed to; and the bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

JONATHAN W. LEIGHT.

Mr. MARTIN. I ask consideration of the bill (H. R. 2716) granting a pension to Jonathan W. Leight.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby directed to put on the pension-roll the name of Jonathan W. Leight, late hospital steward of the Sixty-seventh Regiment Ohio Volunteer Infantry.

The report (by Mr. YODER) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2716) granting a pension to Jonathan W. Leight, beg leave to report as follows:

Jonathan W. Leight was hospital steward of the Sixty-seventh Ohio Infantry Regiment. In the summer of 1862 he was ruptured while lifting a box of hospital stores into a wagon. The team started sudden and threw the heavy weight of the box on him, thereby severely rupturing him. No officer was present, and the claimant, being a hospital steward, and also a partially educated physician, treated himself. His only proof is in the existence of the rupture at and after discharge, and in the fact that he was thoroughly examined physically at enlistment, when he was pronounced to be a remarkably sound and healthy man. In short, he had the same trouble in proof that constantly arises in rupture.

We think the fact that he was not ruptured at enlistment and was at discharge is, under the circumstances, sufficient proof of the fact, especially as he naturally treated himself instead of calling upon a surgeon, as a non-professional person would have done.

Claimant also contracted rheumatism, which was proven to the satisfaction of the Pension Office. On June 30, 1882, the office issued him a certificate, to terminate, however, on October 6, 1883, at which time the office claimed his disability had terminated.

The existence of the rheumatism, and its increasing violence after the termination of the certificate, is testified to by Dr. J. H. Forrester, Dr. S. T. Stewart, Wilson Brown, David Olden, and A. Alexander (all witnesses of excellent repute), but the examining physicians of the Government find a disability for rupture (which the Department holds is not sufficiently proven), but none for rheumatism, which the Department holds is proven.

Under these circumstances we think that his disability to labor—which is conceded—arises from his military service, and that he ought to be pensioned.

We therefore recommend the passage of the bill.

Mr. MARTIN. It is proposed to amend the bill by adding "subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws."

Mr. KILGORE. How much pension is asked in that case?

The CHAIRMAN. It is to be subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws.

The amendment was agreed to, and the bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

MARGARET QUINTON.

Mr. MATSON. I call up the bill (H. R. 10122) granting a pension to Margaret Quinton.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the name of Margaret Quinton, an army nurse during the late war of the rebellion, and pay her a pension at the rate of $12 per month.

The report (by Mr. MATSON) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 10122) granting a pension to Margaret Quinton, have considered the same, and report:

It appears from the papers on file with the committee that Margaret Quinton was employed by the surgeon in charge of a hospital established at Danville, Ky., immediately after the battle of Perryville or Chaplin Hills, in October, 1862, and served as matron of said hospital until March or April, 1863, when she became prostrated by sickness from overwork. At that time she was forty-seven years of age, and until said service had had good health and been capable of earning a comfortable living as tailoress. Since said hospital service she has never recovered her former health, and since 1880 has been entirely disabled from work by weakness and blindness, and dependent on the kindness of friends for subsistence.

The physicians who attended her in her sickness at Danville are both dead, and she is therefore unable to procure medical testimony of said sickness. She has never been married, and is now seventy-three years of age; has no means whatever; is unable from physical weakness to earn anything, and she is entirely dependent upon her neighbors and friends for support.

Dr. Hanna says:

"She has been sick and under his professional care since February, 1887, to the present time, and during all this time she has been confined to her room and a great part of the time to her bed, requiring attention from others; and at no period during this time has she been able to make a support for herself, nor is it probable that she ever will be able to even take care of her room and prepare her own food though the same should be furnished her without cost."

There is ample proof that the claimant served as stated; that she was in good health at the time of her employment; that her health was greatly impaired by reason of said service, and by reason of said sickness has been unable to earn a living by manual labor. In view of her said services, her great age, and her extreme poverty, we believe that the relief asked for ought to be granted.

We therefore submit a favorable report and recommend the passage of the bill.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with a recommendation that it do pass.

WILLIAM FAIRBANKS.

Mr. MCCORMICK. I call up the bill (H. R. 10103) granting a pension to William Fairbanks.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of William Fairbanks, late a private in Company A, Fifteenth Regiment New York State Engineers.

The report (by Mr. SAWYER) was read, as follows:

The claimant served as a private in Company A, Fifteenth New York Engineers, from January, 1862, until February, 1865.

He claims pension for rupture of right side and a wound of head. Claim was rejected because satisfactory evidence was not filed showing origin or treatmnet in service, and claimant has alleged he can furnish no further testimony. Evidence of claimant shows that while on detached duty under Sergeant Moore, who is now dead, guarding a ponton bridge over the Rappahannock, at Branch Ford, while walking upon post was struck in the head and wounded by a piece of shell; he was rendered unconscious, taken to field hospital, and treated for a month or more. From that time until the present he has been a constant sufferer from the effect of said wound. As he was upon detached duty at time of injury it is difficult for claimant to furnish evidence of eye witnesses of incurrence of injury.

Comrades Canavan and Powers, who saw him soon after he received injury, swear he was suffering from wound in the head. They further say that until he was discharged he complained of and was troubled by continual pain in the head and dizziness, and Comrade Canavan says this continued until 1869, until which date he frequently saw him.

Two witnesses who knew claimant before enlistment swear he was a sound, healthy man when he enlisted, that when he returned and until 1873, during which time they frequently saw him, he was feeble, unable to perform manual labor, and constantly troubled with his head.

The medical board at Utica, N. Y., who examined claimant in September, 1886, found a depression, groove-shaped, 1 inch long and one-eighth of an inch deep, over left parietal bone.

The claimant is seventy-five years old, feeble in body and mind. Your committee think the bill should pass, and so recommend.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

JANE ROBINSON.

Mr. MCRAE. I call up the bill (H. R. 9148) to grant a pension to Jane Robinson.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Jane Robinson, dependent widow of Harai Robinson, late a colonel in the First Louisiana Cavalry, United States Volunteers.

The report (by Mr. MATSON) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 9148) granting a pension to Jane Robinson, have considered the same, and now report:

Col. Harai Robinson, husband of the applicant, at the time of his death was drawing a pension for gunshot wound of nates, received in the battle of Sabine Cross-Roads, Louisiana, April 8, 1864. He died suddenly at Gogona, Panama, December 14, 1886, but the exact cause of death could not be ascertained, and hence no application for pension was made at the Pension Office.

Daniel C. Halliday, a physician of twenty-five years' standing, testifies that he was called upon to examine Colonel Robinson's wound some time after he was suffering from it. He found him debilitated from long continued and extensive suppuration of the whole tract, which sometimes diminished in quantity, but never wholly ceased. He adds:

"The long continued suppuration and necessarily constant drain upon his system was productive of alarmingly debilitating effects, and rendered the patient suffering therefrom subject to loss of appetite and loss of flesh and constantly progressive weakness and loss of flesh, which must have brought him to a premature grave, wholly caused by the nature of his wound and its effects."

Colonel Robinson left a lucrative mercantile business and gave his services in behalf of the Union cause. Maj. Gen. W. B. Franklin says:

"Colonel Robinson was distinguished for bravery, energy, and efficiency. He worked hard always, and brought his command to a high state of discipline and efficiency. At the battle of Sabine Cross-Roads he was wounded. I believe that, while Colonel Robinson was in my command, he was as efficient and meritorious an officer as there was in the Department of the Gulf."

The widow of Colonel Robinson, the claimant herein, is proved to be, by competent testimony, in a totally dependent and destitute condition. Favorable action on her application for Congressional relief is earnestly recommended by the Grand Army of the Republic, Department of the Gulf, and a large number of officers and past officers of that department, as well as others, as in every way worthy of asked-for relief. In view of the fact that Colonel Robinson was drawing a pension at the time of his death, that in all human probability the wound for which he was pensioned was the cause of his death, his efficient services as a Union soldier, and the destitute condition of his widow, the committee submit a favorable report and recommend the passage of the bill.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

MARY A. VAN BUSKIRK.

Mr. MORRILL. I call up the bill (H. R. 10824) granting a pension to Mary A. Van Buskirk.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place upon the pension-roll the name of Mary A. Van Buskirk, widow of Charles F. Van Buskirk, late of Company F, Fourth Regiment of Missouri State Militia Cavalry, subject to the provisions and limitations of the general pension laws.

The report (by Mr. MORRILL) is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 10824) granting a pension to Mary A. Van Buskirk, submit the following report:

The husband of claimant served nearly two years in Company F, Fourth Regiment Missouri State Militia. He contracted diseases of the liver and rectum, for which he was receiving a pension at the time of his death. Dr. W. B. Campbell, a reputable physician of Troy, Kans., testified February 17, 1888:

"I have treated Charles F. Van Buskirk, of Troy, Doniphan County, Kansas, as his physician during his last sickness, for chronic disease of liver and rectum, of which disease he died February 1, 1888."

The examining board by whom the soldier was examined December 22, 1886, reported that he was in the last stages of phthisis. It is, it seems to your committee, a question of difference of opinion between doctors as to the existence of diseases closely connected and often mistaken one for the other. The evidence submitted in proof of the soldier's claim shows that he incurred his disability in the service; that it continued and increased until it caused his death. While the decision of the medical referee, based upon the report of the examining board, made fifteen months before his death by physicians who were strangers to the deceased and only saw him for a few moments, may be technically in accordance with the rules of the office, your committee prefer to accept the decision of the family physician, who was his constant attendant and treated him up to the hour of his death. They therefore report the bill back with the recommendation that it pass.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

THOMAS RAINS.

Mr. NEAL. I call up the bill (H. R. 1085) granting a pension to Thomas Rains.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to cause to be placed upon the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Thomas Rains, late captain Company B, Fifth Tennessee Mounted Infantry Volunteers.

The report (by Mr. HUNTER) is as follows:

Thomas Rains, the claimant, from April, 1863, to September, 1864, was engaged in scouting and recruiting for the Federal Army in Kentucky and Tennessee. On September 23, 1864, he was mustered in as captain of Company B, Fifth Regiment Tennessee Mounted Infantry, and served from that time with and as captain of the company up to July 13, 1865, the date the regiment was mustered out, he being mustered out with his company. He alleges that while a member of that company and in the line of duty at Cleveland, Tenn., about the 15th of December, 1864, he was attacked by inflammation of the eyes caused by cold and exposure while on duty.

The evidence is conclusive that he suffered from soreness and inflammation of the eyes for some time previous to his muster out, and that he has so suffered ever since, and that he is now almost totally blind, and unable for the performance of manual labor. The Pension Office rejected the claim because the alleged disability, in the opinion of the examiner, existed prior to enlistment.

While there is some evidence to sustain such a theory, the preponderance and weight of the evidence certainly sustains the claimant, that the disease was contracted in the service about the time alleged.

He is sustained by the testimony of men of high character and standing, among them A. J. Carson, who has been sheriff of Bradley County, Tennessee; Daniel McDonald, deputy sheriff and tax collector; J. C. Tipton, chairman of the county court of said county, and some fifteen or twenty other citizens and comrades, who knew him before his enlistment or muster in, during his service, and after his muster out.

The first intimation in the record as to whether the eyes of the claimant were diseased prior to enlistment is in a letter to the Department by Dr. G. W. Remage, surgeon of the regiment, that he was of the opinion that the disease of the eye existed prior to enlistment; but when his testimony was taken, it appears that Dr. Remage first joined the regiment the last of February, 1865, and that he had never seen Captain Rains until that time, and that was some time after Captain Rains's eyes had become diseased. No reason is assigned for his opinion, and, in fact, he corrects his opinion. The other evidence as to sore or inflamed eyes prior to muster is hearsay, inferential, and unsatisfactory.

As already stated, the evidence seems to be overwhelming that this disability was contracted in the service, and even if the evidence contra should raise a doubt, that doubt should be resolved in behalf of the helpless soldier.

The committee recommend that the bill do pass.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with a recommendation that it do pass.

MARY A. COVEY.

Mr. PARKER. I call up the bill (H. R. 6309) for the relief of Mary A. Covey.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the name of Mary A. Covey, widow of Henry G. Covey, late a private in Company A, Sixtieth New York Volunteers, at the rate of $8 per month, otherwise subject to the conditions and limitations of the pension laws.

The report (by Mr. SAWYER) is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 6309) for the relief of Mary A. Covey, submit the following report:

The claimant, Mary A. Covey, is the widow of Henry Covey, late a private of Company A, Sixtieth Regiment of New York Volunteers.

The soldier married the claimant in 1870, and left surviving him at his decease the widow and two daughters, one of whom has become sixteen years of age during the present year, and the other will reach that age in March, 1889.

This soldier enlisted September 9, 1861; was honorably discharged July 19, 1865; applied for a pension July 19, 1866; he was pensioned at the rate of $8 per month for "disease of right arm." He died April 22, 1885, of disease alleged to be typhoid pneumonia.

The claim of the widow was rejected upon the ground that "the fatal pneumonia not accepted as dependent on disease of right arm; said death cause is not otherwise shown to be due to the service."

The facts appear from the documents on file as follows:

The Assistant Adjutant-General says:

"Roll of Company A, dated July 17, 1865, reports the soldier absent sick since November 18, 1865."

Another report by same officer reports that—

"Roll of Company A for May and June, 1865, reports the soldier sick in New York since November 18, 1864, and subsequent rolls report him the same."

A report dated February 14, 1887, signed by Adjutant-General Drum, says:

"The soldier was enrolled in Company A, Sixtieth New York, September 9, 1861, for three years, and is reported present on rolls from enlistment to December 31, 1862; January and February, 1863, present sick in regimental hospital; March and April, 1863, present, so reported to December 31, 1863. Re-enlisted as a veteran volunteer December 14, 1863, and is reported present on rolls from January 1 to October 31, 1864; November and December, 1864, absent sick in division hospital since November 18, 1864. * * * He was mustered out on invalid-roll at United States Army Hospital, Troy, N. Y., July 19, 1865."

Surgeon-General's record shows that the soldier—

"Was admitted to general hospital, Troy, N. Y., April 5, 1865, from McDougal General Hospital. Diagnosis chronic diarrhea and rheumatism."

Another record from the Surgeon-General's Office says that this soldier—

"Was admitted to McDougal General Hospital, Fort Schuyler, New York Harbor, March 19, 1865, from Savannah, Ga., for treatment for rheumatism and diarrhea, and was transferred to Troy, N. Y., April 4, 1865."

Another report from the Surgeon-General's Office, dated February 11, 1887, shows this soldier—

"Admitted to hospital December 14, 1864, with diarrhea, where he remained until January 22, 1865; also, admitted to general hospital Savannah, Ga., with rheumatism, and was afterwards transferred to hospital steamer S. R. Spaulding, March 13, 1865; diagnosis chronic rheumatism; entered McDougal Hospital with rheumatism and diarrhea, and entered the hospital at Troy with diarrhea and rheumatism, and was furloughed April 23, and readmitted May 20, 1865."

Although the pension was granted for "disease in the right arm," the evidence filed shows that the claimant was a weak and broken-down man from his discharge to the time of his death.

He was subject to a swollen body and to swollen feet and legs, the disease sometimes affecting his brain.

A. M. Larkin, M. D., in an affidavit dated March 28, 1887, says:

"That he was the family physician of this soldier for three years previous to his decease. * * * From the facts and my previous treatment, the disease of his right arm had invaded his whole system, his general health and physical; also his constitution was totally broken down, consequently Henry G. Covey fell an easy prey from the attack of pneumonia, which was the fatal effect of the army trouble which he was afflicted with."

D. C. S. Merrill, a practicing physician of West Liberty, Muscatine County, Iowa, testifies that he knew the soldier for a year just before his death, and says:

"That he knew him as constitutionally broken down; in this condition he was seized with typhoid pneumonia and in ten days succumbed. This disease was the immediate cause of his death, but in my judgment it was but a sequel to the constitutional dyscrasia resulting from his army life."

In a later affidavit the same witness reports the condition of the deceased more fully, and concludes.

"The relation between his diseased condition and the fatal termination of his pneumonia is substantially the relation of cause and effect."

In view of the evidence the committee can but believe that the disabilities from which he suffered, and which was the result of his army life, in part contributed to the death of the soldier, if they were not the principal cause thereof, and that his widow is entitled to the relief sought to be given by this bill, and they therefore recommend that it do pass.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

EDWARD WATERS.

Mr. PETERS. I call up the bill (H. R. 201) granting a pension to Edward Waters.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be authorized and directed to place the name of Edward Waters, late a private in Company K, Ninety-third New York Infantry Volunteers, on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws.

The report (by Mr. MORRILL) is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 201) granting a pension to Edward Waters, submit the following report:

Soldier enlisted in Company K, Ninety-third New York Volunteer Infantry, January 14, 1862, and served until January 27, 1865. In his declaration he claims for rheumatism, contracted in the fall of 1864. The case was rejected by the Pension Office because there was no record of the applicant to show that he suffered from rheumatism during the war, and because he could not produce sufficient proof of the origin of rheumatism in the service. There is no doubt about the applicant having been a sufferer from rheumatism for years, and the only question in the case is whether this rheumatism was contracted in the service.

Jacob Gunston says: "I know Edward Waters; have known him since 1857." He also says: "I have boarded in the same family with him, and worked with him in the same malt-house off and on from 1857 to 1862." He says he was a young man about twenty years of age when he enlisted and was in good health all the time he knew him. "I never knew him to be sick. He also seemed to be strong, hearty, and able-bodied."

Edward Hoghn testifies:

"I knew Edward Waters; have known him since 1857. He worked for my father for about three years in the malt business. He went into the Army in 1862, and was at that time in good health. He was never sick while he worked for my father. When he came back from the Army, in 1865, I saw him at West Troy. He was then weak and sickly. He was suffering from rheumatism and complained to me several times of rheumatism in his arm."

George C. Sambrook, of the same company, testifies that he was a portion of the time with the soldier and knew that he was always in fair health; that he, the affiant, was wounded and went to hospital, and went home to New York in 1864, where he met the soldier, who was then at home on sick furlough; that said Waters was then in bad health, in a very weak condition, and he thought he was suffering from chronic diarrhea; that after the war Waters and himself went into partnership in the buying of some property; that he was with him a great deal, and that he suffered a great deal from rheumatism in the arms, and at times was unable to lift his hand to his head.

Two druggists also testify to having sold him some medicine for rheumatism immediately after the war.

This and other testimony shows that the soldier was sound at enlistment; had never been sick any; that he was sick and on furlough in 1864; that he had rheumatism at that time; that he was sick and had rheumatism in 1865, and from that time on; that he obtained patent medicines for this disability. He has had rheumatism since his discharge during each and every year.

We think, from all the evidence, that it is reasonable to conclude that rheumatism was incurred in the service and in the line of duty, and therefore recommend the passage of the bill.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with a recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. MATSON. I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. MATSON having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. DOCKERY, from the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, reported that they had had under consideration sundry bills and had directed him to report them to the House with various recommendations.

HOUSE BILLS PASSED.

Bills of the following titles, reported from the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar without amendment, were severally ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, they were accordingly read the third time, and passed:

A bill (H. R. 2073) granting an increase of pension to Daniel Willborg;

A bill (H. R. 7657) granting a pension to Mary Woodworth, widow of Ebenezer F. Woodworth;

A bill (H. R. 11029) for the relief of Mary Vanbuskirk;

A bill (H. R. 11030) granting a pension to Susan E. Latture;

A bill (H. R. 6201) granting a pension to John Robeson;

A bill (H. R. 10940) granting a pension to Victoria May;

A bill (H. R. 7457) granting a pension to Eleanor D. Heath;

A bill (H. R. 1007) for the relief of Henry Rose;

A bill (H. R. 10629) granting a pension to Washington Ryan;

A bill (H. R. 2689) granting a pension to Johanna Geyer, widow of Gustave W. Geyer;

A bill (H. R. 7912) for the relief of Frances P. Vernon;

A bill (H. R. 9969) granting a pension to Tempy N. Johnston;

A bill (H. R. 10342) granting a pension to John Dauper;

A bill (H. R. 10121) granting a pension to Sarah A. Mason;

A bill (H. R. 3152) for the relief of Arlington M. Harrison;

A bill (H. R. 10122) granting a pension to Margaret Quinton;

A bill (H. R. 10103) granting a pension to William Fairbanks;

A bill (H. R. 9148) to grant a pension to Jane Robinson;

A bill (H. R. 10824) granting a pension to Mary A. Van Buskirk;

A bill (H. R. 1085) granting a pension to Thomas Rains;

A bill (H. R. 6309) for the relief of Mary A. Covey; and

A bill (H. R. 201) granting a pension to Edward Waters.

House bills of the following titles, reported from the Committee of the Whole House with amendments, were severally taken up, the amendments agreed to, the bills as amended ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, they were accordingly read the third time, and passed:

A bill (H. R. 10738) to increase the pension of George C. Quick;

A bill (H. R. 10241) increasing the pension of Richard Porter;

A bill (H. R. 8200) granting a pension to Lydia Ann Wilber;

A bill (H. R. 9935) to increase the pension of Isaac Hurd;

A bill (H. R. 10245) granting an increase of pension to Hannibal Kimball;

A bill (H. R. 9182) granting a pension to Ransom Riley;

A bill (H. R. 10907) granting a pension to Henry Mitchell Youngblood;

A bill (H. R. 5193) granting an increase of pension to Benjamin Franklin;

A bill (H. R. 2474) granting a pension to Joseph Lincoln Young;

A bill (H. R. 10672) granting a pension to Mighill H. Patten;

A bill (H. R. 9975) granting a pension to Joseph Welsh;

A bill (H. R. 2716) granting a pension to J. W. Leight; and

A bill (H. R. 10210) to increase the pension of Philip Thompson (title amended by striking out "Thompson" and inserting "Thomas").

SENATE BILLS PASSED.

Senate bills of the following titles, reported from the Committee of the Whole House without amendment, were severally ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

A bill (S. 2899) granting a pension to Harriet Welch;

A bill (S. 2721) granting a pension to Jackson Chapman;

A bill (S. 1070) granting a pension to Mrs. Mary R. Armstrong;

A bill (S. 3076) granting a pension to Mary M. Shattuck; and

A bill (S. 3166) granting a pension to William F. Pike.

The bill (S. 2825) granting an increase of pension to Benjamin T. Baker (reported from the Committee of the Whole House with amendment) was taken up, the amendment agreed to, the bill as amended ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. MORRILL moved to reconsider the various votes by which bills reported from the Committee of the Whole House had been passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

WILLIAM S. LATHAM.

Mr. SYMES. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole House be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 10563) granting a pension to William S. Latham, and that the bill be now put on its passage.

There being no objection, the House proceeded to the consideration of the bill, which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of William S. Latham, late a private of Company E, Eighty-seventh Regiment of Illinois Volunteers.

The report (by Mr. HUNTER) is as follows:

The records of the War Department show that claimant was enrolled on the 15th day of August, 1862, at McLeansborough, Ill., in Company E, Eighty-seventh Regiment of Illinois Volunteers, to serve three years or during the war, and was mustered into the service as a corporal on the 22d day of September, 1862, at Shawneetown, Ill.

On the muster-roll of Company E of that regiment for the months of January and February, 1863, he is reported absent without leave since January 22, 1863. Roll for March and April, 1863, reports him "deserted" at Shawneetown, Ill., January 22, 1863. Roll for May and June, 1863, reports him present.

Reported as a deserter January 22, 1863, but, upon the following facts being ascertained, was restored to his company. He obtained a furlough at Shawneetown, Ill., to go to his home in Hamilton County, Illinois, but was taken sick and not able to return until January 6, 1863. Roll from June 30, 1863, to February 29, 1864, reports him "in general hospital, Memphis, Tenn., since July 4, 1863." Roll for March and April, 1864, reports him present. Muster-out roll, dated June 16, 1865, reports him mustered out with company at Helena, Ark.

He filed an application for pension on the 8th day of January, 1870, and alleged in his declaration disability from dropsy of chest, palpitation of heart, and rheumatism contracted in the line of duty; but the claim was rejected by the Pension Bureau on account of the charge of desertion, which appears to have been erroneously entered in his military record, as shown by the corrected record of the Adjutant-General of the Army, above referred to.

In support of his declaration he filed on the 8th day of January, 1870, the following affidavit of Capt. Hiram Angel, who was captain of claimant's company and regiment:

"That he was captain of Company E, Eighty-seventh Regiment of Illinois Volunteers, and that he well knew William S. Latham, who was a corporal of said company and regiment; that while in the service aforesaid, and in the line of duty at the siege of Vicksburg, Miss., on or about June 20, 1863, the said Latham became disabled for the performance of military duty by reason of dropsy of chest, palpitation of the heart, and rheumatism, which were contracted at the time and place aforesaid while doing duty in said sieges, caused by exposure and hard service; that said soldier was in good health at the time of enlistment, and that the diseases aforesaid affected him while in said service and at the time of his discharge so as to render him partially disabled for the performance of military duty."

He also filed in the case an affidavit of Dr. Daniel Berry, who was assistant surgeon of claimant's regiment, which is as follows:

"That while in rear of Vicksburg, Miss., he (claimant) was sent to general hospital February 3, 1863, sick with phthisis.

"That while at Marganzia, La., he was treated for diarrhea and sent to general hospital May 9, 1864. That his means of knowledge are from personal examination and memoranda."

On the 30th day of January, 1870, he filed an affidavit of Dr. W. S. A. Cox, and one of Dr. J. N. Goalden, both of Hamilton County, Illinois, who testify as to having treated claimant for said troubles after his discharge.

He also, on the 30th day of November, 1887, filed an affidavit of Dr. James A. Mahan, and Dr. Augustus Lewis, of Todd County, Kentucky, as to having treated him for his alleged diseases.

Dr. J. R. Bailey, United States examining surgeon at Ferguson, Logan County, Kentucky, made an official examination of claimant on the 21st day of May, 1884, and reports his disability total from the causes stated.

In view of the foregoing facts, your committee feel that this is a meritorious claim, and recommend the passage of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. SYMES moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SAMUEL NEIKIRK.

Mr. SENEY. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole House be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 7185) granting a pension to Samuel Neikirk, and that the bill be now put on its passage.

There being no objection, the House proceeded to the consideration of the bill; which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, directed and authorized to place on the pension-roll, subject to the restrictions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Samuel Neikirk, of Republic,

Seneca County, Ohio, late a private in Company K, One hundred and first Regiment Ohio Volunteer Infantry.

The report (by Mr YODER) was as follows:

Samuel Neikirk, private of Company K, One hundred and first Ohio Volunteer Infantry, enlisted August 15, 1862, and was discharged April 15, 1863. Served subsequently from May 2, 1864, to August 27, 1864, in Company K, One hundred and sixty-eighth Ohio Volunteer Infantry. Filed his declaration for pension in the Pension Office March 31, 1879, alleging disease of the heart and liver and stomach, contracted on a forced march from Louisville, Ky., to Nashville, Tenn., about December 12, 1862. The hospital record shows him sick in convalescent camp since December 26, 1862, to February, 1863. In April was discharged by order of General Rosecrans, at Nashville, for disability.

S. L. Rice, assistant surgeon United States Volunteers, in charge of hospital at Nashville, Tenn., April 15, 1863, certifies that he has carefully examined said private, Samuel Neikirk, finding him unable to perform duties of a soldier because of hypertrophy of the heart attended with excessive action fit.

Dr. H. K. Spooner testifies that he knows from personal knowledge that claimant was sound and able to perform all kinds of labor up to April, 1861. After affiant returned from service, in September, 1865, he found him suffering from disease of the heart, liver, and stomach, which have now become chronic. Affiant has treated claimant continuously for said disease, with only palliating results. He is disabled from performing all manual labor permanently.

H. K. Spooner, M. D., testifies that he was family physician of claimant prior to his enlistment, and that he was sound and free from rheumatism, heart disease, and liver complaint; states also that he treated him in 1865, and he was one-half disabled by reason of disease of heart, liver, and stomach.

His application for pension was rejected, after having been recommended by special examiners of the board of review, upon the technical ground that the disease had existed prior to enlistment. But, after a careful examination of all the evidence on file, which is very voluminous, your committee believe this to be a meritorious case, and recommend the passage of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. SENEY moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The hour of half-past 10 o'clock having arrived, the House, in accordance with its order, stands adjourned till to-morrow at 12 o'clock m.

PRIVATE BILLS INTRODUCED AND REFERRED.

By Mr. WHEELER: Petition of William L. Bradford, for removal of disabilities—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

IMPORTATION OF CHINESE LABORERS.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri, under leave to print on Senate bill to prohibit importation of Chinese laborers, presented the following letter and memorial:

SAN FRANCISCO, July 30, 1888.

DEAR SIR: Inclosed you will please find a copy of the memorial adopted at the great anti-Chinese mass meeting held in this city July 25. We would thank you to lay it before the Committee on Labor, of which you are a member.

Respectfully,

H. C. KINNE, Chairman.

Hon. JOHN J. O'NEILL.

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

The people of San Francisco, in mass meeting assembled for the purpose of devising some means to save our State from the incoming of Chinese coolies, whose immigration is expressly prohibited by the laws passed by you, do represent as follows:

We recognize that Congress has responded to the wishes of the people of the United States by adopting such legislation as we all deemed necessary to and adequate for that end. That such legislation would have been sufficient to accomplish the end for which it was intended had it been enforced in good faith, according to the spirit in which it was devised, there can be no doubt.

Although the law has been upon the statute-books since 1882, and was amended four years ago with the intent to strengthen its provisions in order to meet the technical objections raised by the judiciary on the Federal bench of this coast, the fact remains that a larger number of Chinese are entering the port of San Francisco to-day than have entered at any other time in our history. There are practically no greater restrictions upon the entry of Mongolians than upon that of Europeans, the only difference being that a head tax is imposed upon Mongolians for the benefit of the courts instead of the Treasury.

Thus have the efforts of Congress to protect American labor from ruinous and degrading competition with a servile race been defeated. The situation is so alarming as to endanger the peace of this State, because the judges whose duty it is to uphold the law have brought the administration of the law into contempt.

If not to the law, where can the people look for protection? If the efforts of Congress heretofore to protect the people shall continue to be thwarted, the people must and will protect themselves.

By your act of 1882, as amended, it was provided that certain certificates would be the sole evidence of the right of any Chinaman to land. The administration of this law was placed in the hands of the collector of customs. In the attempt to carry out the provisions of this law the customs officials have been thwarted at every step by the mandates of the Federal courts. By the abuse of the right of habeas corpus the administration of the act has been taken from the hands of the collector of customs and usurped by the courts. The examination of Chinese on board ships by the customs authorities provided for in your act—which was the greatest safeguard against the fraudulent landing of coolies—has been vetoed by the Federal courts, although it was approved by the President. So determined have been the judges to defeat the plain and only purpose of the law that they have gone the length of threatening with imprisonment the customs officials who have sought to perform the sworn duty imposed upon them by the Congress and President of the United States.

Since you ordained in 1884 that no Chinaman should enter this country without possessing a certain certificate showing his right to land, nine thousand have been landed by habeas corpus. This violation of law has been accomplished through the agency of the Federal judges, who have set up a standard of their own above and in defiance of the law. Clothed with that discretion which is inseparable from a proper exercise of the judicial office, they have in every instance used it in behalf of the Chinese and against the spirit of the law. Every doubt has been resolved against the interests of the people. Had they been paid attorneys of the Chinese while sitting on the bench they could not have worked more persistently and eagerly at throwing down the guards which you set up against this immigration. Each cooly landed by habeas corpus represents legal fees amounting to $20. The circuit court, which is the conduit through which this Asiatic filth flows, has for its fee-receiving clerk a near relative of the judge. So great has been the inpour of this profitable, though forbidden, immigration, that the regular machinery of the court has proved inadequate to the demand.

A subsidiary court not contemplated by statute has been created for the admission of Chinese, and no fee now goes to waste. This subsidiary court receives a fee of $3 for every Chinaman landed, and does its work at the rate of one Chinaman every ten minutes during business hours. At the present time there are in San Francisco's Chinatown no less than 4,000 certificateless coolies landed upon habeas corpus, turned loose on bail and awaiting examination. Many of them have been on shore as long as six months. The only proof of prior residence required by the circuit court and its annex from these men is an ability to answer certain questions to show a slight familiarity with the geographical features of San Francisco, and the entry of their names in the books of the Chinese Six Companies or in the accounts of a Chinese merchant. Every one of this army of coolies can secure his final discharge at the expense of a false oath and the payment of the required fees. Meantime this swarm of Asiatics who are supposed by law not to be in the country, are actively competing with American labor in all branches of industry and aiding in the reduction of the scale of wages to the Chinese level. The amount represented on the bonds for which Chinese residents are sureties is already in excess of the assessed valuation of all the propeaty owned in San Francisco by the Chinese population.

That the interpretation placed upon the law by Judges Sawyer and Sabin and Commissioner Houghton is not a necessary, but an arbitrary interpretation, is shown by the brief sitting of Judge Ross of the southern district of California. This jurist was recently invited to sit upon the circuit bench in this city. His rulings were such as to exclude the Chinese, and such as to spread dismay and panic among the whole colony of fee-receiving officials, coolie brokers, attorneys, straw bondsmen, and all other parasites who are living and fattening upon the decaying remains of the restriction act.

Judge Ross's sitting was brief. He has not been invited to sit on the circuit bench again. He has been dropped from Judge Sawyer's visiting list.

We, the people of San Francisco, appeal to Congress to end this monstrous conspiracy, to save the Pacific coast and the country from the consequences of an abuse of judicial power unparalleled since the time of Jeffreys.

The House of Representatives has created a committee to investigate the subject of contract labor. We invite that committee to visit this city. We promise to place before it facts which will demonstrate the truth of every allegation made in this memorial. When this proof has been made and submitted to Congress we demand remedial action. What that action should be is self-evident. No law which you have placed upon the statute-books has been able to withstand the hostile and destructive assaults of the Federal judges of this coast. You have given us a new treaty and contemplate the passage of a still more stringent exclusion act. We are grateful for these honest efforts to save us from Chinese association and competition, but in the light of experience what confidence can be felt that any law or any treaty will be carried into effect while its administration rests in the hands of judges who have annulled every existing statute. While they remain upon the bench Chinese exclusion is impossible.

We demand the impeachment and removal of Lorenzo Sawyer, judge of the United States circuit court of the ninth circuit, and of George M. Sabin, district judge for the district of Nevada.

Adopted in mass meeting of trades unions and citizens of San Francisco July 25, 1888.

H. C. KINNE, Chairman.
HAMILTON H. DOBBIN, Secretary.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, August 25, 1888.

The House met at 12 o'clock m., and was called to order by the Clerk of the House.

ELECTION OF SPEAKER PRO TEMPORE.

The Clerk directed the reading of the following:

WASHINGTON, D. C., August 25, 1888.

DEAR SIR: As I will be absent from the Capitol until Monday, you will please ask the House to elect a Speaker pro tempore.

JOHN G. CARLISLE, Speaker.

Hon. JOHN B. CLARK,
Clerk House of Representatives.

The CLERK. The rules of the House provide that, when the Speaker is absent and has failed to designate some member to preside, it becomes the duty of the House to elect a Speaker pro tempore to act during the temporary absence of the Speaker. Nominations for that purpose are now in order.

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Clerk, I offer the resolution which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That Hon. CHARLES F. CRISP, a Representative from the State of Georgia, be, and is hereby, elected Speaker pro tempore during the temporary absence of the Speaker.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. CRISP, on taking the chair as Speaker pro tempore, was greeted with applause.

Prayer was offered by Rev. J. H. CUTHBERT, D. D., of Washington, D. C.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

NOTIFICATION TO THE SENATE.

Mr. BLOUNT submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Clerk be directed to notify the Senate that the House has elected Hon. CHARLES F. CRISP, a Representative from the State of Georgia, as Speaker pro tempore during the temporary absence of the Speaker.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. HOLMAN. I call for the regular order.

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The SPEAKER pro tempore laid before the House the amendment of the Senate to the joint resolution (H. Res. 201) to correct an error in an act making an appropriation for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1889, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. This is merely a formal amendment to insert the word "of" before the word "California" where it occurs in the bill; and if there be no objection the amendment will be concurred in.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

REFERENCE OF SENATE BILL.

The SPEAKER pro tempore also laid before the House the bill (S. 3276) granting restoration of pension to Sarah A. Woodbridge; which was read twice, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE MISSISSIPPI AT ST. LOUIS.

The SPEAKER pro tempore also laid before the House the bill (S. 3474) amendatory of an act authorizing the construction of a bridge over the Mississippi River at St. Louis, Mo., approved February 3, 1887; which was read twice.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, a similar bill to this has been unanimously reported from the House Committee on Commerce. The Senate bill strikes out the word "stockholder" where it is used in the House bill in connection with the holding of stock in other bridge companies. There is no objection, I understand, to it whatever as it has passed the Senate, and I ask unanimous consent that it be now taken up and considered.

Mr. ADAMS. What is the state of the House bill?

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. It has been unanimously reported from the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. ADAMS. And is now on the Calendar?

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. It is.

Mr. ADAMS. The request is what?

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. To take up the Senate bill and pass it.

Mr. ADAMS. I presume there will be an explanation of the bill if consent is given.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

Mr. PAYSON. Let an explanation be made first, reserving the right to object.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. It will be remembered that in the bill passed during the last Congress there was a proviso—I refer now to the bill granting the right to construct a bridge across the Mississippi River at St. Louis, passed last winter, for the purpose of enabling the merchants of that city to build a bridge to compete with the present bridge structure there—which proviso prohibted any of the stockholders from being also interested in the stock of any other bridge company. It has been found that by the insertion of the word "stockholders" in that connection it will be difficult if not impossible to secure this competing bridge for the reason that the owning of stock in any other bridge company by any of the stockholders of the proposed company operates as a forfeiture of its charter.

The House will understand that the merchants of St. Louis are the prime movers in the demand for this bridge. The incorporators and stockholders comprise many of our best citizens. It is they who ask for this amendment, and I am willing to aid them in removing any obstacle to the building of this bridge and giving our people the relief from the excessive tolls of the present bridge company, and also furnish ampler facilities for the handling of freight.

I earnestly hope there will be no objection made, and this the last obstacle to the building of this additional commercial highway thereby removed.

All the rights of the people in regard to protecting them in the construction of this bridge and tolls thereon appear to be amply covered without it, and that provision which the Senate proposes to eliminate interferes with the placing of the bonds and the building of the bridge. I repeat, it is unanimously reported from the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. DOCKERY. I join with my colleague from Missouri in expressing the hope that there will be no objection to the consideration of this bill. It is quite important not only to the people of St. Louis, but to the State of Missouri.

Mr. ADAMS. Does the gentleman believe that the other provisions embodied in the bill are ample to secure protection?

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. I do.

Mr. ADAMS. Is it a high bridge?

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. Yes, sir.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 11 of the act entitled "An act authorizing the construction of a bridge over the Mississippi River at St. Louis, Mo.," approved February 3, 1887, be, and the same is hereby, amended by striking out the words "stockholder or" wherever they occur in said section, so as to make said section read as follows:

"SEC. 11. That whereas a principal reason for giving authority to build the bridge herein contemplated is to secure reasonable rates and tolls for corporations and individuals for passing over the same, the St. Louis Merchants' Bridge Company, or its successors or assigns, shall not agree or consent to the consolidation of this bridge with any other bridge across the Mississippi River, or to the pooling of the earnings of this bridge company with the earnings of any other bridge company on said river, nor shall any person who is or may be a director or manager of any other bridge over said river be a director or manager of the bridge herein provided for: Provided, That if this provision of this act shall at any time be violated in any of these particulars, such violation shall, without legal proceeding, at once forfeit the privilege hereby granted, and said bridge shall become the property of the United States, and the Secretary of War shall take possession of the same in the name and for the use of the United States."

SEC. 2. The right to amend or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. I demand the previous question.

Mr. FARQUHAR. I would like to ask the gentleman from Missouri a question. Was not the word "stockholders" incorporated originally in the bill which passed the House as a safeguard against any monopoly in respect to the new bridge company against the old, which has been regarded as a monopoly? I would like to know from the gentleman why the word "stockholder" is now to be eliminated.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. For the reason that they find it very difficult to build a bridge and place the stock with such a provision that if any person owning stock in the new bridge should own any stock in any other bridge company it would forfeit the charter. They say that it leaves the charter in this position, that the very parties they are trying to prevent from interfering could by simply having one share of stock in this bridge—that fact would destroy their charter.

Mr. FARQUHAR. Why was there not a qualifying expression used, such as "shall not hold shares in any competing bridge company?" That would cover the ground. Now, I understand the people of St. Louis desire this as a competing bridge, and the safeguard by the use of the word "stockholders" in that connection was embodied in the bill, and was thought originally to be one of the very strongest points in favor of giving the right to build the bridge when the House bill was sent to the Senate. It is manifest, if this change is made, that the protection sought to be thrown around it will be entirely eliminated, because at the end of a year they will have a new board of directors, and by securing control of the stock that board may be able to control both bridges. In other words, they can change the present management. I simply ask for general information.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. I think, if the gentleman will pardon me, the very thing he refers to is in their power. The managers of the competing bridge by purchasing even one share of the stock in the new bridge could succeed in destroying the charter.

Mr. FARQUHAR. Does the new bill exclude them from the right of purchasing?

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. No power can do that when bonds are openly sold.

Mr. FARQUHAR. Then, having bought the shares, they can, of course, by buying enough have control of both.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. Yes; but if they buy one share under the bill they would destroy the charter, and that provision prevents the merchants of St. Louis from going forward and constructing the bridge. We are now at the mercy of and practically controlled by the one company owned by Gould.

Mr. FARQUHAR. Yes.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. And our business men are trying to build a competing bridge.

Mr. FARQUHAR. Then the friends of the bridge favor this amendment?

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. It is my understanding that the merchants of St. Louis are asking that this change be made. The Senate passed this unanimously, and the House Committee on Commerce has reported unanimously in favor of it. It is entirely acceptable to our people who are building the bridge.

Mr. FARQUHAR. I am glad to understand that. I only asked for information.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Is it the understanding that this bil will prohibit the company from owning stock in another bridge?

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. It is, and there is ample protection in the bill against pooling the earnings.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. By buying any stock in this company it works the forfeiture of the charter of this company.

Mr. ADAMS. The gentleman will see that it is absolutely essential that this provision should be stricken out, because if it is not stricken out the power to buy one share implies the power to buy one share more than the majority. Therefore there should be some provision in another part of the bill against their pooling.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. That is amply protected in other provisions besides this.

I now move the previous question upon the passage of the bill.

The previous question was ordered, and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If there be no objection, House bill No. 11249, similar to the Senate bill just passed, will lie on the table.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. GALLINGER, for this day, on account of important business.

To Mr. ARNOLD, for two weeks, on account of important business.

To Mr. MCKENNA, for four days, on account of important business.

To Mr. FRENCH, for to-day, on account of important business.

To Mr. SIMMONS, for two weeks, on account of sickness in his family.

To Mr. BOWDEN, for one week, commencing from Monday next, on account of important business.

To Mr. GAY, for two weeks, on account of ill-health.

To Mr. STEWART, of Vermont, indefinitely, on account of sickness.

ENROLLED BILL.

Mr. KILGORE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found duly enrolled a bill of the following title:

A bill (H. R. 10556) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1889, and for other purposes.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill H. R. 1661 for the erection of an appraisers' warehouse in the city of New York, and for other purposes.

POLYGAMY LAWS.

Mr. KILGORE. I demand the regular order.

Mr. ROGERS. I rise to a question of privilege. I am directed by the Committee on the Judiciary to report back the resolution requesting the Attorney-General to furnish certain information in reference to the pardon of persons convicted under the anti-polygamy laws, and ask that the same lie on the table; and also to report a substitute favorably, which they ask be adopted at this time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Attorney-General be requested to furnish to the House of Representatives the number of convictions for polygamy, adultery, and unlawful cohabitation had in the Territories of Utah and Idaho under the provisions of the anti-polygamy law of 1862, and the act of 1882 amendatory thereof, and the act of March 3, 1887, and the dates thereof as shown by the records of the Department of Justice, together with the amount of fines, forfeitures, and costs collected from said prosecutions, with the date of judgments under which said several sums were collected; a list of pardons granted by the President of the United States to persons convicted of such crimes of polygamy, adultery, and unlawful cohabitation, respectively, in the said Territories of Utah and Idaho, giving the name, date of sentence, time of imprisonment, amount of fine, date of pardon, and the reason for granting the same in each case.

Mr. ROGERS. The Clerk has read the substitute.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk informs the Chair that he has reported the substitute.

Mr. ROGERS. I think the original should be disposed of first.

Mr. PETERS. I would like to hear the original resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Attorney-General be requested to furnish to the House of Representatives a list of pardons granted by the President of the United States to persons convicted of the crime of unlawful cohabitation in Utah Territory and in Idaho Territory since March 4, 1886, giving the name, date of sentence, length of sentence, and date of pardon in each case.

Mr. ROGERS. I ask for the reading of the accompanying report.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on the Judiciary, having had under consideration the resolution "requesting list of persons pardoned who had been convicted of polygamy," report the same back, and recommend that it be laid on the table.

And the committee also report a substitute in lieu of said resolution, and recommend the passage thereof.

The reason that induced the committee to report the substitute is that the original resolution limited the inquiry to a very narrow field, not even embracing the several crimes created and made punishable under the anti-polygamy law; whereas the committee thought that if the information which the resolution calls for was desirable, and they thought that it was, that the field of inquiry should be so extended as to put the House in possession of all the facts relating to the enforcement of the anti-polygamy laws and the pardon of persons convicted thereunder in the Territories named in the resolution.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, I furnished on yesterday morning to the representative from Idaho Territory, who is the author of the original resolution, a copy of the substitute resolution, which I understood from him was satisfactory, but he desires to make a brief statement to the House, and in order to enable him to do so I will now yield him five minutes, or ten if necessary.

Mr. DUBOIS. I desire a little more time than five minutes.

Mr. ROGERS. Ten minutes?

Mr. DUBOIS. Perhaps ten or fifteen minutes.

Mr. ROGERS. Then, Mr. Speaker, I retain the floor and yield the gentleman ten minutes.

Mr. DUBOIS. Mr. Speaker, I am very glad that the Judiciary Committee saw fit to enlarge the scope of the resolution which I had the honor to introduce. I am satisfied that a great deal of valuable information will be furnished as a consequence of the adoption of the resolution. In addition to the request which was embodied in my original resolution, that a list should be furnished of the pardons which have been granted to those convicted of unlawful cohabitation, adultery, and polygamy, the committee have added a request that the number of convictions had for these various crimes shall also be furnished. This information will absolutely and utterly refute a statement which has been brazenly made and reiterated by the agents of the Mormon Church here that only 1½ per cent., or less, of their people are in polygamy.

When you talk about people being in polygamy you do not refer to babies in arms or to children of tender age. Only those of such an age as to assume the duties and responsibilities of married life can be considered as fit subjects of discussion in regard to polygamy. The information which will be furnished in accordance with the resolution as enlarged by the committee will show that more than 1½ per cent. have been convicted of these crimes in the Territory of Utah. When a man is convicted of polygamy or unlawful cohabitation that means that three persons at least are in that relation. A man can not be in polygamy without having at least two wives, so that, as I have said, for every conviction there are at least three persons in polygamy. Now, there are not more than sixty thousand adult Mormons in Utah Territory, and the information called for by this resolution will prove beyond question that more than the number which they persistently state are in polygamy have been convicted under the law, and no man who has any regard for truth and veracity will undertake to say that one-twentieth of those who are in polygamy have been convicted.

The number of indictments out is larger than the number of convictions, and it is notorious that those people resort to every means to evade the law. Those who are indicted flee and hide, and a great many who are not suspected are in this relation. I stand by the statement which I had the honor to make before the Senate committee, that about one-half of the adult Mormons in Utah are in polygamy. As regards Idaho, I had the evidence before me as United States marshal of the Territory to demonstrate that at least one-third of the adult Mormons in that Territory were in polygamy. The enlarged resolution also asks for a statement of the amount of fines and forfeitures collected. For that I thank the committee. The Mormon Church has known for years that it was contrary to law for a church to hold property in excess of $50,000. Since the passage of the Tucker-Edmunds law the Government has wrested from them several hundred thousand dollars which they had wrung from the poor dupes of their church in order to fasten the shackles on them more firmly. You will find, too, that whereas in almost all cases of conviction for unlawful cohabitation a fine of $150 or $300 is imposed in addition to the sentence, scarcely one of the parties convicted pays the fine.

They hold that a man has to be exalted in a certain degree in order to enter into this relation; that he must be picked out for some special merit, and the opinion is prevalent that they never take a second wife unless they can provide for her. There is not one in twenty of those convicted who, at the expiration of his term, does not go before the proper officer and swear that altogether he is not worth $300, and thus escape further imprisonment under the "poor man's oath." Those men have two or three families, and yet they are not able to raise $300 with all their property! These facts will be shown when this resolution is answered, because I speak from the record, and the records will confirm what I say. What sort of families can such people bring up? What sort of a crime is it for men to raise families in such poverty? The number of pardons which have been granted to Mormons who have violated the Edmunds and the Edmunds-Tucker law is quite large; and I should say that in Utah nearly 10 per cent. of them have received Executive clemency. The effect of this is to encourge them in their immoral practices, to fill them with false hopes as regards the disposition of the Government towards their institution. The judges in Idaho and in Utah have adopted a practice of asking a Mormon, who is convicted of unlawful cohabitation, what his intentions are in the future in regard to obedience of the law.

If he promises to obey the law sentence is suspended. This is the invariable custom in both these Territories. The judges insist that this promise to obey the law does not prevent parties from taking care of their second or third or other families, but that it is their duty to do so. They must cease, however, to hold out their plural wives as wives in public or in private, and must so act as to make it known that they do not regard them as wives.

The intention of the judges and other officers in Utah and Idaho is and has been to be lenient and charitable, and to encourage the devotees of this very peculiar institution to break away from their criminal organization and obey the laws. As I have said, it is not necessary for one of them to go to the penitentiary. All that he has to do is to promise to obey the law and he will escape.

One of the objects of punishment for crime is to reform. Executive clemency should never be granted, except in unusual cases, unless the criminal at least promises repentance and shows a disposition to lead a better life. Nothing was further from my intention in introducing my resolution than to ascribe improper motives in the matter of these pardons either to the President or to the Attorney-General. I receive inquiries very frequently from Utah and Idaho asking why this or that person should have been pardoned, and by whom the pardon was recommended. It is also inquired of me if efforts are being made to get certain persons released, how many have been pardoned, etc. This is a matter of very great concern to the law-abiding citizens of Utah and Idaho, who have been battling there on the frontier these many years to maintain the law and break down this polygamous institution. I have no doubt that plausible reasons have been given in each case, and that no protests of an adverse kind have been filed in individual cases. It may be that some of those pardoned have asked pardon on a written promise to obey the laws in the future. I myself cheerfully recommended a pardon based on the ground of future obedience to the law. I am satisfied that the information asked for will show no improper motive on the part of President Cleveland.

The representative of the Mormon Church on this floor, the distinguished gentleman from Utah, is very energetic in all matters affecting his Church, and is indefatigable in his efforts to secure pardons for this class of criminals, both in his own Territory and mine. No one would object more strongly than he, however, if one of these poor fanatics wished to promise to obey the law, and thus escape punishment in the first place.

The Mormon emissaries who have been lobbying here all winter have made very many cunning statements and empty promises in behalf of their church; and I imagine that many of these statements will be found indorsed on the applications for pardons. The truth is that there is no sign in Utah or Idaho that the Mormon Church has abandoned or intends to abandon polygamy. They do not teach and proclaim it so publicly as in past years because of the severity of recent laws and because of an ill-founded hope that they may deceive Congress into granting them statehood for Utah. In the Territory which I have the honor to represent, the Gentiles—Democrats and Republicans—united in the Legislature in passing a law which takes away the right to vote, to sit on a jury, or to hold office from any one who belongs to an organization which teaches or practices or encourages polygamy. I will read a part of our law referring to the oath which an elector must take:

I do further swear that I am not a bigamist or polygamist; that I am not a member of any order, organization, or association which teaches, advises, counsels, or encourages its members, devotees, or any other person to commit the crime of bigamy or polygamy, or any other crime defined by law, as a duty arising or resulting from membership in such order, organization, or association, or which practices bigamy or polygamy, or plural or celestial marriage, as a doctrinal rite of such organization; that I do not, and will not, publicly or privately, or in any manner whatever, teach, advise, counsel, or encourage any person to commit the crime of bigamy or polygamy, or any other crime defined by law, either as a religious duty or otherwise.

Mr. Speaker, that law disfranchised every Mormon in Idaho Territory. It has been in force during four years. It has been passed upon by the courts and sustained, and not one of those Mormons has taken that oath.

I have seen in various newspapers harsh criticisms of President Cleveland based on the frequency with which he grants these pardons. I believe his motives are misunderstood, and I believe also that he sees but one side of this question, and that clemency has the effect to encourage and not to check polygamy. I trust there will be no opposition to the adoption of this resolution.

Mr. ROGERS. I now yield twenty minutes to the Delegate from Utah Territory [Mr. CAINE].

Mr. CAINE. Mr. Speaker, the purpose of those who originated this resolution was plainly political. As to the resolution as reported from the Judiciary Committee I not only have no objection, but I most earnestly favor its adoption. The information it calls for will show conclusively that undue leniency has not been shown to convicted persons in Utah and Idaho, and at the same time it will demonstrate under whose administration the laws in question have been most rigidly enforced.

The President, by the sixth section of the anti-polygamy law of 1882, was given authority to grant amnesty to certain classes of offenders guilty, before the passage of said act, of bigamy, polygamy, or unlawful cohabitation. During the debates in Congress upon this bill while on its passage it was clearly foreshadowed that the then existing status of the polygamists in Utah would be recognized and amnesty granted to those living in that relation. Bygones were to be bygones; the past was to be forgiven; the people were to be granted an opportunity to start anew. I need not say that no such opportunity has been afforded. No amnesty to classes has been granted; all alike have been prosecuted. Out of the hundreds convicted in Utah and Idaho very few have been granted pardons, and only to those who have served a portion of their time in the penitentiary. None, however, have been pardoned except in cases of extreme old age, sickness, or for other good reasons. No such pardon has been granted except upon the recommendation of the United States district attorney who prosecuted the case. Some petitions have been favorably indorsed by the judges who tried the cases, and sometimes the governor of the Territory, the United States marshal, and other Federal officials have joined in the request.

The petitions for executive clemency which have been presented through me, have been mostly signed by non-Mormons, the bankers, merchants, and other prominent business men of Utah, who while strong advocates of the enforcement of the anti-polygamy laws, do not consider it necessary to the safety of the nation and the perpetuity of American institutions that men over seventy years of age should be imprisoned for unlawful cohabitation.

I will not attempt to notice any criticisms made upon the President for his action in granting a few pardons to sick and aged men in Utah and Idaho. I believe that the President is abundantly able to take care of himself, and if this resolution is adopted the Attorney-General will give such reasons for the President's action in these matters as will be entirely satisfactory to this House and to the country.

The intemperate remarks of the gentleman from Idaho do not call for any reply from me. The whole history of the Mormon people—what they are, what they have done in Utah, Idaho, Arizona, and elsewhere—furnishes the refutation for stale slanders like those he has treated us to. Facts speak louder than words.

But, Mr. Speaker, with the indulgence of the House I propose briefly to show what efforts the people of Utah have made within the last two years to settle the so-called Mormon question, and to bring that much-abused Territory into harmony with the rest of the nation. To do so satisfactorily to myself, and intelligibly to the House, I must go back and speak of the causes which lead up to the existing state of things in Utah.

Forty-two years ago a body of people, abandoning their homes, set out to find an abiding place where, unmolested by mob violence, they might rear their tabernacles and temples and worship God in peace and earn an honest living by the sweat of their brows. In all the history of mankind there is not the record of another undertaking comparable to that of the pilgrimage from Nauvoo, on the banks of the Mississippi, to the valley of the Great Salt Lake. Ten thousand people within a little more than two years transplanted themselves from the immediate neighborhood of the Mississippi River to a desert region more than 2,000 miles distant. The migration, considered in all its aspects, I repeat, is without parallel in the annals of the human race. The exodus began in the dead of winter, the pioneer band crossing the Mississippi River on the ice. Save a few hundred miles the way was through a country possessed by savages, never friendly and often hostile to intruding white men. The road had to be marked out, bridges built, and means of crossing great rivers provided. The hostile Indians had to be conciliated, settlements formed, crops planted and grown to provide provisions for the thousands who followed. From the beginning to the end perfect discipline was maintained. There was no collision with the wild Indians. There were hardships and sufferings endured, but none died of hunger. Disease, exposure, anxiety, toil, homesickness did their work, and the graves of loved ones marked every resting-place along that 2,000 miles of pilgrimage.

Triumphing over every obstacle, heroically overcoming every difficulty, the desert valley, on the shores of the Great Salt Lake, was reached. The region was not then the domain of the United States; it was the territory of Mexico, with which we were at war. One of the first acts of the pioneer band was to scale a lofty mountian peak, unfurl the Stars and Stripes, and take possession in the name of the United States.

The weary wayfarers came to the valley through Emigration Cañon. No more uninviting and heart-discouraging prospect ever met the gaze of emigrants than that which spread out west, north, and south. To-day the prospect is pleasing and grand, because the mountains, the lakes, the streams, are settings to a picture which the patient endeavors of an industrious people have wrought. Then the grandeur of the setting but added to the dull, dead monotony of alkali plains covered with sage-brush, the emblem of depressing solitude.

The men who led, the thousands who followed, were Americans to the core. They were of the best lineage New England, New York, Pennsylvania, and Ohio can boast. Their sires and their grandsires had fought for liberty and human rights, for the principle of local community self-government, and the rights of freemen, during the war of 1812, and the glorious struggle for independence. More than one in five of their able-bodied sons were then serving their country as volunteers in the war with Mexico. They were of the stock that helped to win for you and for me our great heritage of freedom and grand domain. Their descendants, Mr. Speaker, have ever cherished as priceless that heritage. They realize the inestimable blessings they have enjoyed under the Constitution of the United States, and they revere t as the work of men who were inspired by God for that special service.

I have said, Mr. Speaker, that the desert region of Great Salt Lake Valley presented an uninviting prospect in 1847. But it was the land to which an exiled people had been led under the direction of Divine Providence. The winter which followed was one that men who were children then will remember to the hour of their death. Even now, in dreams, they experience anew the pangs of awful hunger endured during the terrible winter and succeeding spring, when but for the roots which the Indians taught them to dig and eat many scores must have perished.

The work which the settlers of Utah have done speaks for itself. It is not alone the material development they have wrought; the conversion of a desert region into an earthly paradise; the transformation of the dreariest and most forbidding of waste places into fruitful fields; the building of great and flourishing cities and towns; the founding of settlements and the planting of colonies; the construction of railroads and the opening of mines. They founded a commonwealth; they laid broad and deep the foundations of a community which has been much maligned, but which one day will receive the recognition its intrinsic worth entitles it to. It is a community of 200,000 souls, with material possessions worth not less than $250,000,000—a community, Mr. Speaker, as thoroughly American as any one on this continent; a community, sir, with a less percentage of foreign-born population than many others of your Territories; a community where the percentage of illiteracy is the same as that of the State of Connecticut; a community where the general morality, the industry, the sobriety, the thrift of the people have excited the admiration of every unprejudiced Old World traveler who has visited Utah; a community where 90 per cent. of the heads of families own their homes.

Where on this earth will you find another people of whom this can be said? There is not an almshouse nor the necessity for one in any settlement where my people alone are found. We have no labor problem, no socialistic tendencies, and the dread specter of anarchism does not disturb us in our waking or sleeping moments. We are largely an agricultural and pastoral people; our possessions are chiefly lands, herds, and flocks, and the distribution thereof per capita presents none of the inequalities which elsewhere, even in our country, cause just alarm among reflecting men. Among my people the rich are not growing richer and the poor poorer. For more than forty years the public affairs of a great and growing community have been administered with a wise conservatism which ought to excite your highest admiration. The opportunities an arid country, where cultivation of the soil depends upon irrigation, offers the few for self-aggrandizement must be apparent to every thinking man. Water sources are easily secured by the first comers, and incorporated companies can easily monopolize control of water rights. Point me to another region in the Western country where the system of irrigation is a necessity and the tillers of the soil are not dependent on capitalists who sell water by the inch.

My people have dug their own ditches, made their own canals by a system of community co-operation, and hence we have no land nor water monopolies. The public works of Utah, our roads and bridges, our Territorial institutions, will compare favorably with those of any of the Territories. We have a common-school system which is non-sectarian, and the excellence of which has been highly commended by your Commissioner of Education. We have not incurred obligations for the future, but have paid our way from current receipts. There is not a dollar of county, municipal, or Territorial bonded indebtedness, save in Salt Lake City, where bonds were issued in a relatively small amount to build an irrigating canal more than 20 miles long, for the benefit of the municipality. This indebtedness has been largely anticipated by redemption of the bonds before they were due. The aggregate assessment of the property in the Territory is $38,000,000, while its actual value is over $250,000,000. The rate of taxation is very low, being only 6 mills on the dollar for Territorial and school purposes, not to exceed 6 mills for county expenses, while the cities have not assessed over 5 mills for municipal purposes.

Mr. Speaker, there is no longer a possibility of objecting to Mormons on account of polygamy. That is a dead issue. It can not be vitalized. But undoubtedly our opponents will be most reluctant to abandon the old cry which has served them so long and so well. They will, however, have to abandon the cry against polygamy, because it has ceased to exist. It has been suppressed by act of Congress, and the great bulk of the Mormon people have accepted the situation.

What does the record show? It shows that recently in regular judicial proceedings in Salt Lake City, the fact was proven by a high church official that the Mormon Church no longer gave permission for plural marriages. The late Chief-Justice Zane of the supreme court of Utah, in answer to an inquiry from General McClernand, one of the Utah commissioners, says no case of polygamy occurring since the passage of the Edmunds-Tucker law has come under his judical notice. Moreover, the Territorial Assembly adopted a resolution in regard to the laws enacted by Congress known as the Edmunds, and Edmunds-Tucker acts, respectively of March 22, 1882, and March 3, 1887, which is as follows:

Resolved, That said Assembly are in favor of a just, humane, and impartial enforcement of said laws of the United States, in the same manner as other criminal laws are enforced, under the Constitution and laws of our country, to the end that said offenses may be effectually prohibited.

And further, the Legislative Assembly has enacted, and the governor has approved, a marriage law for the Territory prohibiting and declaring void a marriage "when there is a husband or wife living from whom the person marrying has not been divorced;" providing also that no marriage shall be solemnized without a license, for the issuing of which the most stringent regulations, under pains and penalties, are provided, and prescribing who shall solemnize marriages, and making it a penal offense, punishable by imprisonment in the penitentiary not exceeding three years or fine not exceeding $1,000, or by both fine and imprisonment, for any person knowingly, with or without such license, to solemnize a prohibited marriage. No State in the Union has a more complete and perfect marriage law, and few if any States have one in all respects so good.

I assert, moreover, and the official evidence supports my assertion, that since the constitutionality of the act of Congress of July 1, 1862, was affirmed by the Supreme Court of the United States plural marriages were exceptional and not general among the Mormons.

The act of Congress of March 22, 1882, as construed by the courts and the Utah Commission, disfranchised every person who was or had been living in polygamy. Retroactive as this law was in its effects, it was enforced, and the Supreme Court of the United States strained a point to sustain its constitutionality by holding that it merely prescribed a status, and did not inflict disfranchisement as a punishment. We had woman suffrage in Utah. Every man and every woman who had lived in polygamy, as well as those who were then in polygamous relations, were disfranchised. The total number thus disfranchised, according to the report of the Utah Commission, was about 12,000; so that, allowing for those who had ceased to live in polygamy, old men whose wives were dead, widows whose husbands were dead, and plural wives, the male polygamists could not, and did not then, exceed 2,500. I honestly believe there are to-day in Utah less than 2,000 males who can be termed polygamists, and of this number there are very few if any who are violating the law against unlawful cohabitation.

Mr. Speaker, intelligent and philosophical students of the dangers threatening our social life have no fears of Mormonism or of the continuance of polygamy in Utah. Hear what Bishop Spalding, of Illinois, a thoughtful and earnest man, has to say in the Forum for March, in considering the question, "Is our social life threatened?" He says:

Of Mormonism, too, as a social danger, much that is superficial and idle is spoken and written. The Mormons are sober, industrious, and thrifty, and their acceptance of polygamy is our only grievance against them. But polygamy, beyond all question, we need not fear at all. Even among the Mormons it exists in comparatively few instances.

This is sober truth. Less than 1 per cent. of the population of Utah to-day have been polygamists. The great majority of the Mormon voters have voted to make polygamy a crime punishable by fine and imprisonment. A Mormon Territorial assembly demands the enforcement of the laws of the United States against bigamy, polygamy, unlawful cohabitation, incest, adultery, and fornication. It provides a marriage law which imposes heavy penalties in the event of plural marriages being solemnized. This ought to satisfy reasonable men.

Among the 165,000 Mormons of Utah, as I have heretofore stated, there are not more than 2,000 men who have ever had a plurality of wives. Not one of these 2,000 men can, under the law, exercise any political rights. They can not vote, and they can not hold office. Before a citizen of Utah can register and be qualified to vote he must take the following oath:

I, ——— ———, being duly sworn (or affirmed), depose and say that I am over twenty-one years of age, that I have resided in the Territory of Utah for six months last past, and in this precinct for one month immediately preceding the date hereof; and that I am a native-born (or naturalized, as the case may be) citizen of the United States; that my full name is ——— ———; that I am ——— years of age; that my place of business is ——— ———; that I am a (single or) married man; that the name of my lawful wife is ——— ———, and that I will support the Constitution of the United States, and will faithfully obey the laws thereof, and especially will obey the act of Congress approved March 22, 1882, entitled "An act to amend section 5352 of the Revised Statutes of the United States in reference to bigamy, and for other purposes," and that I will also obey the act of Congress of March 3, 1887, entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to amend section 5352 of the Revised Statutes of the United States in reference to bigamy, and for other purposes,' approved March 22, 1882," in respect of the crimes in said act defined and forbidden, and that I will not, directly or indirectly, aid or abet, counsel or advise any other person to commit any of said crimes defined by acts of Congress as polygamy, bigamy, unlawful cohabitation, incest, adultery, and fornication.

Subscribed and sworn to before me this ——— day of ———, 188—.

——— ———.

If the registrars choose they can require the applicant to take this additional oath:

I, ——— ———, further swear (or affirm) that I am not a bigamist, polygamist, or living in unlawful cohabitation, or associating or cohabiting polygamously with persons of the other sex, and that I have not been convicted of the crime of bigamy, polygamy, unlawful cohabitation, incest, adultery, or fornication.

——— ———.

The only male citizens who can participate in political affairs in Utah are those who can pass the ordeal of the above oaths. They are the great majority, because only a small fraction of the Mormon men have ever practiced polygamy.

Mr. Speaker, the monogamous Mormons, those who not only have never practiced polygamy, but have solemnly sworn that they will obey the law of March 22, 1882, and that of March 3, 1887, and, further, that they will not directly or indirectly aid or abet, counsel or advise any other person to commit any of said crimes defined by acts of Congress as "polygamy, bigamy, unlawful cohabitation, incest, adultery, and fornication," have made and accepted a constitution under which they ask the admission of Utah as a State in the Union. That constitution provides, section 12 of Article XV:

Bigamy and polygamy being considered incompatible with "a republican form of government," each of them is hereby forbidden and declared a misdemeanor.

Any person who shall violate this section shall, on conviction thereof, be punished by a fine of not more than $1,000 and imprisonment for a term not less than six months nor more than three years, in the discretion of the court. This section shall be construed as operative without the aid of legislation, and the offenses prohibited by this section shall not be barred by any statute of limitation within three years after the commission of the offense; nor shall the power of pardon extend thereto until such pardon shall be approved by the President of the United States.

This section of the constitution can not be altered or amended without the consent of Congress and proclamation by the President of the United States. Section 1 of Article XVI provides:

That section 12 of Article XV shall not be amended, revised, or in any way changed until any amendment, revision, or change as proposed therein shall, in addition to the requirements of the provisions of this article, be reported to the Congress of the United States, and shall be by Congress approved and ratified, and such approval and ratification be proclaimed by the President of the United States, and if not so ratified and proclaimed said section shall remain perpetual.

Mr. Speaker, as a member of the convention which framed this constitution under which the people of Utah are asking admission to the Union, I repudiate with scorn the accusation which, in effect, is made against the men who framed that constitution and the thirteen thousand and odd hundred people who voted to ratify their work, that it was the result of a conspiracy hatched for the purpose of deceiving the people of the United States. I denounce as an infamous slander the insinuation that it was an attempt to gain admission to the Union under false colors and upon false pretenses.

Four several times the people of Utah have presented, in regular form, their application for admission to the Union. In numbers it was not questioned that they were sufficient, nor was it denied that the importance and extent of their territorial interests entitled them to statehood. The one obstacle which stood in their way, the one objection which was raised, was the practice of plural marriage or polygamy in the Territory. They were told that until this obstacle was removed, until this objection ceased to exist, they could not hope to secure admission to the Union.

When the Mormons insisted that plural marriages were sanctioned by their church, and that, according to their religious belief, such marriages were not sinful, the reply was that the practice was deemed detrimental to public morals, and hence came within the legitimate legislative domain. The State, while it could not prescribe or proscribe religious beliefs, could forbid practices which, although sanctioned by the Old Testament, and permitted by a new revelation, were deemed immoral. They were told, time and time again, that it was not a question of their religious belief, of their creed, of their church polity, of their ecclesiastical organization, but simply and solely the practice of polygamy. Indeed, they could have been told only this. The religious belief of a people, the creed of a church, its ecclesiastical organization, are subjects with which Congress could not and can not deal. The Constitution of the United States expressly and emphatically declares that all such questions are and must remain without the domain of legislative enactment.

Therefore the people of Utah had the right to believe that if they came with a constitution which prohibited polygamy, and made it an offense, and inflicted punishment therefor, and gave reasonable guaranties that in this respect they would not alter and amend it, they would be conceded the boon of statehood. I declare it to be my honest belief that the people of Utah, in perfect sincerity, adopted section 12 of the fifteenth article, prohibiting polygamy and making it punishable by fine and imprisonment, with the full knowledge of all that the language of that section implies and imports; that they did deliberately and unreservedly accept that section as part of the organic law under which they desire to live; and further, that it was and is their intention to enforce, without fear or favor, the infliction of the penalties therein prescribed against bigamy and polygamy.

And I declare that it is utterly false, without one element of truth, that the Mormons attach a meaning to the words "bigamy and polygamy" different from their common acceptation. The constitutional convention dealt with "bigamy and polygamy" as you and the people of the United States understand the words. It accepted them in the sense in which they are employed in the laws which Congress has enacted in reference to the offenses they describe. It accepted them as describing an offense which is constituted by a male person who, having one lawful undivorced wife, marries another woman.

It is the merest balderdash to insist that the Mormon Church has maintained, does maintain, or may hereafter maintain that plural marriage is one thing and bigamy and polygamy are other and entirely different things. The members of the constitutional convention who, as a committee, draughted section 12 of article 15, who voted to incorporate it in the constitution, and the people who voted to ratify the work of the convention did so without any mental reservation whatsoever. They knew perfectly well what they were doing. They intended that bigamy and polygamy should be made offenses in the future State, punishable by heavy fine and imprisonment, and they not only fixed the offense in the organic law and provided the penalty for the infraction thereof, but they provided that in this particular the constitution should not be "amended, revised, or in any way changed" without the approval of the Congress and the President of the United States.

Why should we be accused of insincerity? Why should we be suspected of bad faith? The whole history of the Mormon people gives the lie to the assertion that they are hypocrites. Even the majority of the Utah commissioners, men who have no love for us, are compelled to declare that "the Mormon people can not be called hypocrites." Of the 16,640 votes cast at the last election in Utah, 13,195 were for the ratification of the constitution with section 12 of Article XV, prohibiting polygamy and prescribing penalties for its infraction, and only 502 against it. Of the 16,640 voters who went to the polls, only 2,943 refrained from voting for or against the constitution. The 13,195 voters, I insist, were honest and conscientious men. They never had been polygamists. They never had violated the law against polygamy or against unlawful cohabitation. They had not accepted the revelation concerning plural marriages as mandatory and obligatory upon them. They had taken the stringent oath I have read; had solemnly sworn that they intended to obey the laws, and that they would not—

Directly or indirectly aid or abet, counsel or advise any other person to commit any of said crimes defined by acts of Congress as polygamy, bigamy, unlawful cohabitation, incest, adultery, and fornication.

It is a preposterous proposition to insist that a whole people have deliberately forsworn themselves. You must bear in mind that every man who sat in that constitutional convention, every man who recorded his vote in favor of that constitution, had, with uplifted hand, in the presence of his God, solemnly sworn that he was not a bigamist or polygamist, that he would obey the laws known as the Edmunds and the Edmunds-Tucker laws in respect to the crimes in said acts defined and forbidden, and that he would not, directly or indirectly, aid, abet, counsel, or advise any other person to commit any of said crimes defined by acts of Congress as polygamy, bigamy, unlawful cohabitation, incest, adultery, and fornication.

There has been no act in the lives of the men who took this oath which justifies the monstrous calumny that they swore to a lie. Pardon me for saying that the man who will proclaim in print, or verbally, such an accusation against over thirteen thousand men, who, individually and collectively, are worthy members of a community that has a high standard of general morality, deserves to be branded the monumental slanderer of his time!

Why should these men be suspected of such crimes as perjury, of a purpose to gain the admission of Utah by wholesale fraud and deceit? They have never broken the law against bigamy or polygamy. Some of them, indeed many of them, had the opportunity to take more than one wife when there was no law forbidding them so to do. All but the youngest of them might have married repeatedly had they so desired, when the anti-polygamy law of 1862 was practically a dead letter upon the statute-books, no attempt being made to enforce it. They abstained from so doing. Why should they be suspected of a secret purpose to do so now or at some future time?

Mr. Speaker, the faction responsible for the misrepresentation and the misconception of the facts in regard to the sincerity and good faith of the great majority of the Mormon people have abandoned their insistance that the danger of the revival of polygamy is the ground of their opposition to Utah's admission to the Union. Their opposition is upon altogether different ground. In answer to an invitation to take part in the formation of a constitution for Utah, the Republican Territorial committee said:

We are free to say (and we oppose the State organization and admission on that basis) that in so far as the institution of polygamy has been an obstacle in the way of the success of the scheme of statehood, we suppose that your organization is prepared to surrender to the public sentiment of the country and abandon it.

As the basis of their proposition they insisted that—

The masses of the people of Utah are adherents of an ecclesiastical system which forbids all harmonious relations with any system of civil government founded on the right of man to govern himself. The central idea of your system is that all lawful government emanates by revelation from God to His priesthood, and that it is the duty of all its followers to be advised by that priesthood on all subjects of a governmental as well as spiritual character.

The so-called Democratic organization in Utah, speaking by the chairman of its Territorial committee in response to a like invitation, declared:

Your party is the dominant church, and that church, as a political organization, constitutes your party. Nothing contained in one is wanting in the other, and neither contains what is not tolerated in the other. They are one and the same in their membership, so that independent political action by an individual can never occur except with apostasy from the creed.

Thus, Mr. Speaker, it will be seen that our local obstructionists who want Utah kept in Territorial bondage while admitting our "surrender to the public sentiment of the country" on the subject of polygamy, nevertheless insist that so long as Mormons "shall in numbers be superior to the non-Mormon population, Utah ought to be kept in bondage and Mormons deprived of all civil rights." They insist that the Mormon Church must be reorganized, that its present ecclesiastical system is incompatible with their notions of church government.

This objection, reduced to a simple proposition, is "the Mormon people are united, and, being in the majority, will control the State government; hence we oppose the admission of Utah into the Union as a State. For a time polygamy served our purpose, but that being removed we raise the howl about the union of church and state."

Mr. Speaker, the men who insist, for a purpose, that the Mormon people are in favor of a union of church and state know better. They know that when the Mormon people, in 1849, formulated a constitution for the state of Deseret, they declared in their bill of rights, among other things, that:

All men shall have a natural and inalienable right to worship God according to the dictates of their own consciences; and the general assembly shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion or prohibiting the free exercise thereof, or disturb any person in his religious worship or sentiments; provided he does not disturb the public peace nor obstruct others in their religious worship; and all persons demeaning themselves peaceably, as good members of the state, shall be equally under the protection of the laws; and no subordination or preference of any one sect or denomination to another shall ever be established by law, nor shall any religious test be ever required for any office of trust under this state.

The constitution which has been presented to Congress, the work of the convention of 1887, declares in its bill of rights, Article I:

SEC. 2. All free governments are founded on the authority of the people, and instituted for their equal protection and benefit.

SEC. 3. There shall be no union of church and state, nor shall any church dominate the state.

SEC. 4. The right to worship God according to the dictates of conscience shall never be infringed, nor shall the state make any law respecting an establishment of religion or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; nor shall any control of or interference with the rights of conscience be permitted. No religious test or property qualification shall be required for any office of public trust, nor for any vote at any election, nor shall any person be incompetent to testify on account of religious belief, or the absence thereof.

It is not true that the Mormon Church is an "ecclesiastical system which forbids all harmonious relations with any system of civil government founded on the right of man to govern himself." The book of Doctrine and Covenants, which, with the Bible and the Book of Mormon, form that church's standard of faith and practice, prescribes the following rule as to the relations of the church to the state:

We believe that governments were instituted of God for the benefit of man, and that he holds men accountable for their acts in relation to them, either in making laws or administering them for the good and safety of society. We believe that no government can exist in peace except such laws are framed and held inviolate as will secure to each individual the free exercise of conscience, the right and control of property, and the protection of life.

We believe that religion is instituted of God, and that men are amenable to Him, and to Him only, for the exercise of it, unless their religious opinions prompt them to infringe upon the rights and liberties of others. We do not believe that human law has a right to interfere in prescribing rules of worship to bind the consciences of men, nor dictate forms for public or private devotion; that the civil magistrate should restrain crime, but never control conscience; should punish guilt, but never suppress the freedom of the soul.

We do not believe it just to mingle religious influence with civil government, whereby one religious society is fostered and another proscribed in its spiritual privileges and the individual rights of its members as citizens denied. We believe that all religious societies have a right to deal with their members for disorderly conduct according to the rules and regulations of such societies, provided that such dealings be for fellowship and good standing, but we do not believe that any religious society has authority to try men on the right of property or life; to take from them this world's goods, or put them in jeopardy either of life or limb; neither to inflict any physical punishment upon them. They can only excommunicate them from their society and withdraw from them their fellowship.

Is there one declaration in this promulgation by that church of its relations to civil government which any man can object to? Does it not conform in every particular to that famous embodiment of principles wherein Thomas Jefferson defined the respective limitations of civil and religious authority?

Mr. Speaker, I admit that the Mormon people are united, but I deny that their unity is due to ecclesiastical authority. Irishmen are united. Is their unity due to the fact that they are Roman Catholics? No, sir. It is due to the fact that they are determined to regain the right of community self-government, which they were wrongly deprived of, and which is unjustly denied them. The Mormon people are united because there has been, and there is, a settled purpose on the part of a small but persistent minority to deprive them of the right of local community self-government.

Mr. Speaker, I have endeavored thus briefly to show what the monogamic Mormons of Utah have done to place themselves and the Territory in accord with public sentiment and to solve a troublesome problem. Entertaining as they do the highest veneration for the institutions of their country, as well as a due respect for the opinions of the majority, they deliberately determined on the course they ought to pursue. They put their hands to the plow. They drew the furrow broad and deep. They will not look back.

Mr. ROGERS (having yielded one minute additional to Mr. CAINE) said, at the conclusion of that time: Mr. Speaker, the members of the Judiciary Committee, so far as I am advised, have no disposition to make any observations in relation to what has been said either by the gentleman from Idaho [Mr. DUBOIS] or the gentleman from Utah [Mr. CAINE]. Nor am I advised that any other member of the House desires to be heard on this question. As there are other matters pressing which prevent me from extending further the time of the gentleman from Utah, I ask unanimous consent that he may be permitted to extend his remarks in the RECORD.

There being no objection, leave was granted.

Mr. ROGERS. I now move the previous question on the adoption of the resolution reported by the Judiciary Committee as a substitute for that which was referred to them.

The previous question was ordered; and under the operation thereof the resolution reported as a substitute was adopted.

Mr. ROGERS moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If there be no objection, the original resolution will lie on the table.

There being no objection, it was ordered accordingly.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BURNES. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with the morning hour for the call of committees, coupling the motion with the usual request that gentlemen having reports to make may file them with the Clerk.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

FILING OF REPORTS.

The following reports were filed by being handed in at the Clerk's desk:

ADULTERATION OF FOOD.

Mr. LAIRD, from the Committee on Agriculture, reported back the bill (H. R. 10320) to prevent the sale, manufacture, or transportation of adulterated articles of food, drink, and drugs manufactured or made in one State and intended to be sold in another, or intended for export, or for sale in the District of Columbia, or any Territory or reservation of the United States, and to prevent the exportation or importation of adulterated food, drink, or drugs, and for creating a pure-food division in the Department of Agriculture; which was laid upon the table.

He also, from the same committee, reported back in the nature of a substitute for the foregoing, a bill (H. R. 11266) for the establishment of a pure-food division in the Department of Agriculture, to provide for the inspection of live stock about to be slaughtered at slaughter-houses, canning, salting, packing, and rendering establishments, the carcasses or products of which are intended for human consumption in any State or Territory other than where slaughtered, or for exportation to foreign countries; to prohibit the introduction of adulterated or misbranded food or drugs into any State or Territory or the District of Columbia from any other State or Territory or foreign country, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

W. H. COLLARDS AND OTHERS.

Mr. THOMAS, of Wisconsin, from the Committee on War Claims, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 7534) for the relief of W. H. Collards, John A. Elsaser, Peter Johnston, George Shade, M. G. Brown, Jonas F. Reitz, and L. H. Boyd; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

HENRY SETZER.

Mr. HENDERSON, of North Carolina, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 11227) for the relief of Henry Setzer; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

JOHN EBERT.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Ohio, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 10337) granting a pension to John Ebert; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

SARAH A. HARRISON.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Ohio, also, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 8580) granting a pension to Sarah A. Harrison; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

JOHN HURST.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Ohio, also, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 7018) granting a pension to John Hurst; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

LAWRENCE DOUGHERTY.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Ohio, also, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 9813) granting a pension to Lawrence Dougherty; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

JONAS DOERING.

Mr. SAWYER, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back with amendment the bill (S. 3141) granting an increase of pension to Jonas Doering; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

MARY ALICE WHITE.

Mr. HERMANN, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 10079) for the relief of Mary Alice White; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

PUBLIC BUILDING, CAMDEN, N. J.

Mr. LEHLBACH, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 10754) to amend an act entitled "An act for the erection of a public building at Camden, N. J.;" which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

CHARLES RITCHEY.

Mr. YODER, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back with amendment the bill (H. R. 10503) granting an increase of pension to Charles Ritchey; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

CATHARINE TEEGARDIN.

Mr. YODER also, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 10827) for the relief of Catharine Teegardin; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

EASTER GAVEN.

Mr. YODER also, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 11005) granting a pension to Easter Gaven; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The motion to dispense with the morning hour was agreed to.

Mr. BURNES. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of general appropriation bills.

Mr. DIBBLE. I would like to ask the gentleman from Missouri to withhold that motion until the time I suggested on yesterday, that is to say, Tuesday next at 1 o'clock, and I renew now the proposition I then made. I find that a great many interested in this question are absent; and an inspection shows that of those who are absent from the House now there are at least forty more absent on our side than on the side the gentleman represents. If he will postpone the matter until Tuesday next both sides will have an opportunity to be here. Some gentlemen are on their way now. I ask, therefore, that the course I have suggested be taken.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Ohio. Regular order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular order is the motion of the gentleman from Missouri that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The question was taken; and on a division there were—ayes 62, noes 0.

Mr. DIBBLE. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. DIBBLE. I make the point of order that a quorum has not voted on the motion.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The point of order being made that no quorum has voted, the Chair will appoint tellers.

Mr. BURNES and Mr. DIBBLE were appointed tellers.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 56, noes 0.

Mr. DIBBLE. No quorum.

Mr. BURNES. Mr. Speaker, as there has been no vote in the negative, not even that of my colleague appointed to count the members, I feel constrained to demand a call of the House. I make that motion.

The motion for a call of the House was agreed to.

The roll was accordingly called, and the following members failed to answer to their names:

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The doors will now be closed and the names of the absentees called, on which call excuses are in order.

The names of the absentees were called, as follows:

Mr. ALLEN, of Massachusetts: No excuse offered.

Mr. ATKINSON: No excuse offered.

Mr. BAKER, of New York: No excuse offered.

Mr. BARRY: No excuse offered.

Mr. BELDEN: No excuse offered.

Mr. BELMONT: No excuse offered.

Mr. BIGGS: No excuse offered.

Mr. BINGHAM: No excuse offered.

Mr. BLANCHARD: No excuse offered.

Mr. BOUTELLE: No excuse offered.

Mr. BROWER: No excuse offered.

Mr. THOMAS H. B. BROWNE: No excuse offered.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana.

Mr. CHEADLE. I ask that my colleague, Mr. BROWNE, be excused on account of indisposition.

There was no objection.

Mr. BROWN, of Ohio: No excuse offered.

Mr. BRUMM: No excuse offered.

Mr. BRYCE: No excuse offered.

Mr. BUCHANAN: No excuse offered.

Mr. BUCKALEW: No excuse offered.

Mr. BURNETT: No excuse offered.

Mr. BURROWS: No excuse offered.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH: No excuse offered.

Mr. FELIX CAMPBELL: No excuse offered.

Mr. CAMPBELL, of Ohio: No excuse offered.

Mr. TIMOTHY J. CAMPBELL: No excuse offered.

Mr. CANDLER: No excuse offered.

Mr. CARLTON: No excuse offered.

Mr. CATCHINGS: No excuse offered.

Mr. CHIPMAN.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CHIPMAN] asks leave of absence for this day.

There was no objection.

Mr. CLARDY: No excuse offered.

Mr. CLARK: No excuse offered.

Mr. COCKRAN: No excuse offered.
Mr. COGSWELL: No excuse offered.
Mr. COLLINS: No excuse offered.
Mr. COMPTON: No excuse offered.
Mr. COOPER: No excuse offered.
Mr. COTHRAN: No excuse offered.
Mr. COX: No excuse offered.
Mr. CRAIN: No excuse offered.
Mr. CUMMINGS: No excuse offered.
Mr. CUTCHEON: No excuse offered.
Mr. DALZELL: No excuse offered.
Mr. DARGAN.
Mr. DIBBLE. I ask unanimous consent that my colleague, Mr. DARGAN, be excused. He has been absent on leave, but possibly the leave has expired within the last day or two.
Mr. PAYSON. Unless the gentleman is ill, I object.
Mr. DIBBLE. I move that he be excused for this day.
Mr. PAYSON. I would like a statement as to why the gentleman's colleague is absent.
Mr. DIBBLE. My colleague is absent on business, and I suppose had leave of absence for so many days. I was told on yesterday that it was just out; but I have no doubt that the business on which he obtained leave has detained him.
Mr. PAYSON. I suggest that the gentleman ought not to be excused, and I suppose that this is as good a time as any to state the reason why. A hundred and fifty of us are in constant attendance upon the sessions of the House, and the point of no quorum is made because those who are in what may be called an organized raid upon the Treasury decline to vote. No friend, therefore, of the gentleman ought to be excused except for valid reasons.
Mr. DIBBLE. I do not know how the gentleman would vote if he were present.
The question being taken on the motion of Mr. DIBBLE, it was rejected.
Mr. DARLINGTON: No excuse offered.
Mr. DAVENPORT: No excuse offered.
Mr. DAVIDSON, of Alabama: No excuse offered.
Mr. DE LANO: No excuse offered.
Mr. DORSEY: No excuse offered.
Mr. DOUGHERTY: No excuse offered.
Mr. DUNHAM: No excuse offered.
Mr. ERMENTROUT: No excuse offered.
Mr. FELTON: No excuse offered.
Mr. FINLEY: No excuse offered.
Mr. FISHER: No excuse offered.
Mr. FITCH: No excuse offered.
Mr. FORD: No excuse offered.
Mr. FUNSTON: No excuse offered.
Mr. GAINES: No excuse offered.
Mr. GALLINGER: No excuse offered.
Mr. GAY: No excuse offered.
Mr. GLOVER: No excuse offered.
Mr. GOFF: No excuse offered.
Mr. GRANGER: No excuse offered.
Mr. GREENMAN: No excuse offered.
Mr. GROSVENOR: No excuse offered.
Mr. GROUT.
The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Vermont [Mr. GROUT] asks leave of absence for this day.
Mr. PAYSON. I object, unless the reason is sickness.
Mr. GUENTHER: No excuse offered.
Mr. HARE: No excuse offered.
Mr. HARMER: No excuse offered.
Mr. HATCH: No excuse offered.
Mr. HAYDEN: No excuse offered.
Mr. HAYES: No excuse offered.
Mr. HEMPHILL: No excuse offered.
Mr. HIRES: No excuse offered.
Mr. HOGG: No excuse offered.
Mr. HOLMES: No excuse offered.
Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois: No excuse offered.
Mr. HOPKINS, of New York: No excuse offered.
Mr. HOUK: No excuse offered.
Mr. HOWARD: No excuse offered.
Mr. HUDD: No excuse offered.
Mr. JOHNSTON, of North Carolina.
Mr. COWLES. My colleague, Mr. JOHNSTON, is absent on account of sickness, and I ask that he be excused.
The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is informed that the gentleman has leave of absence.
Mr. JONES: No excuse offered.
Mr. KELLEY: No excuse offered.
Mr. KENNEDY: No excuse offered.
Mr. LANDES: No excuse offered.
Mr. LATHAM: No excuse offered.
Mr. LAWLER: No excuse offered.
Mr. LONG: No excuse offered.
Mr. MAFFETT: No excuse offered.
Mr. MAHONEY: No excuse offered.
Mr. MASON: No excuse offered.
Mr. MCADOO: No excuse offered.
Mr. MCCLAMMY: No excuse offered.
Mr. MCCOMAS: No excuse offered.
Mr. MCCULLOGH: No excuse offered.
Mr. MCKENNA.
Mr. MORROW. I ask that my colleague, Mr. MCKENNA, be excused. I think he has obtained leave of absence.
Mr. CHEADLE. He asked for leave of absence this morning.
The SPEAKER pro tempore. He has been granted leave.
Mr. MCKINLEY: No excuse offered.
Mr. MCKINNEY: No excuse offered.
Mr. MCMILLIN: No excuse offered.
Mr. MCSHANE: No excuse offered.
Mr. MILLIKEN: No excuse offered.
Mr. MILLS: No excuse offered.
Mr. MOFFITT: No excuse offered.
Mr. MONTGOMERY: No excuse offered.
Mr. MORRILL.
Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. My colleague, Mr. MORRILL, was in the House this morning, but was called out on important business, and I ask that he be excused for one day.
Mr. PAYSON. I object.
Mr. MORSE: No excuse offered.
Mr. NICHOLS: No excuse offered.
Mr. NORWOOD: No excuse offered.
Mr. OATES: No excuse offered.
Mr. O'DONNELL: No excuse offered.
Mr. O'FERRALL: No excuse offered.
Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri.
Mr. HEARD. I ask that my colleague, Mr. O'NEILL, be excused. I have personal knowledge that he was sent for by the head of one of the bureaus on important business, and I ask that he be excused.
Mr. PAYSON. Was it on account of public business?
Mr. HEARD. It was official business, and he will be back in a short time.
The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to Mr. O'NEILL being excused?
Mr. BLAND. I understand that he was sent for by the Department.
Mr. BLOUNT. On the assurance of the gentleman [Mr. HEARD] that his colleague is likely to be here soon I withdraw the objection.
The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there further objection? The Chair hears none.
Mr. OUTHWAITE: No excuse offered.
Mr. OWEN: No excuse offered.
Mr. PATTON: No excuse offered.
Mr. PEEL: No excuse offered.
Mr. PERRY: No excuse offered.
Mr. PHELPS: No excuse offered.
Mr. PIDCOCK: No excuse offered.

Mr. WARNER: No excuse offered.
Mr. WEBER: No excuse offered.
Mr. WEST: No excuse offered.
Mr. WHITE, of New York: No excuse offered.
Mr. WHITING, of Michigan: No excuse offered.
Mr. WHITING, of Massachusetts: No excuse offered.
Mr. WICKHAM.
Mr. ROMEIS. I ask that my colleague, Mr. WICKHAM, be excused on account of sickness.
There was no objection.
Mr. YARDLEY: No excuse offered.
Mr. WILBER: No excuse offered.
Mr. WILKINS: No excuse offered.
Mr. WILSON, of West Virginia: No excuse offered.
Mr. LYNCH. My colleague, Mr. BUCKALEW, is absent, and I would ask that he be excused.
Mr. PAYSON. I object.
Mr. HENDERSON, of North Carolina. My colleague, Mr. SIMMONS, has gone home on account of sickness in his family, and I ask that he be excused.
There was no objection.
Mr. CHEADLE. My colleague, Mr. HOVEY, is temporarily absent, and I ask that he be excused.
Mr. BLOUNT. I object.
The SPEAKER pro tempore. One hundred and fifty gentlemen have answered to their names.
Mr. PAYSON. I rise to offer a privileged resolution.
The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the resolution.
The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the leaves of absence now in force, except for illness, be revoked, to take effect at the meeting of the House on Monday next, and that on and after that day, until further order of the House, no pairs will be filed or recognized in cases except where the absence of one of the members making the pair is on account of illness and leave granted therefor.

Mr. WEAVER. Will the gentleman yield to me?
Mr. PAYSON. I yield so much time as the gentleman from Iowa may desire.
Mr. WEAVER. I hope that the resolution will be adopted, and I welcome the gentleman as an able ally.
Mr. PAYSON. The gentleman enlisted at the first call.
Mr. STEELE. I want to know whether this is the regular order. It is not the regular order.
The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is the regular order.
Mr. STEELE. This is to revoke leaves of absence already granted. The question is——
The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair has announced that 152 gentlemen have answered to their names and that less than a quorum is present.
Mr. SENEY. Many of those absent may be still in the city.
Mr. TAULBEE. I rise to a question of order.
Mr. BLOUNT. I raise a question——
Mr. COBB. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.
The SPEAKER pro tempore. The House will come to order.
Mr. TAULBEE. I desire to make the point of order against the resolution which has just been read, that it is not in order.
Mr. PAYSON. I present that as a privileged matter.
Mr. TAULBEE. We are proceeding under a call of the House.
Mr. PAYSON. There is no question that we are proceeding under a call. I was about to say that the Speaker passed upon this very question when it was presented by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WEAVER] some days ago. But, aside from precedent, there can be no doubt about it as a question of principle that the House has power to revoke leaves of absence.
The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair has no difficulty as to the first portion of the resolution being in order, that portion which proposes to revoke leaves of absence heretofore granted to members; because the Chair thinks the House must necessarily have that power, or else it would be unable to discharge its constitutional duty with a quorum; but upon the latter part of the resolution the Chair is not so clear.
Mr. PAYSON. I would like to be heard for a moment before the Chair decides the question.
The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will hear the gentleman on the latter part of the resolution.
Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Speaker, I suggest to the gentleman from Illinois that he modify his resolution by omitting the part about which the Chair has doubt, as practically nothing can come of it any way, because members can abstain from voting, and the gentleman accomplishes a very large part of his purpose by the first portion of the resolution.
Mr. PAYSON. But I submit to the gentleman from Georgia that striking out the last part of this resolution will not meet the difficulty, for this reason: Gentlemen pair only because they are permitted to do so by the rules of the House, and if a pair is pronounced improper and is not recognized by the House, then of course I assume that members will not enter into pairs. There is no rule in express terms providing for the making of pairs between members, but there is a rule which recognizes the existence of the practice, and it is a part of the common law of this body that gentlemen of opposite political parties do enter into this pairing arrangement, which is recognized tacitly if not by the express terms of our rules. But the difficulty is that gentlemen who are absent for purposes of pleasure, and for such purposes alone, make pairs with gentlemen who remain in constant attendance here, and when those gentlemen who remain here are asked to vote and besought to vote to make a quorum they say, "As a matter of honor I can not vote; I am paired with A, B, or C, who is at Atlantic City or up at Oakland, and I can not vote."
I insist that the burden of public duty does not rest, or ought not to rest, with any more weight upon me than upon gentlemen who are away for their own pleasure; and when they come back here to draw some more money from the Sergeant-at-Arms and go away again [laughter] and say, "We have had a very pleasant time," I do not receive that sort of statement with any sort of complacency. [Laughter and applause.] It is the business of the Representatives of the American people to stay here and transact the public business, instead of leaving the House to go through such a performance as this [applause], for it is only a performance that we have been going through here day after day.
What good are we doing by sitting here and answering to roll-calls when one gentleman on the other side, representing a lot of claimants against the Government, and those who side with him sit back and refuse to vote? We are sitting here going through what is worse than a performance. I use broader and stronger language yet. I say it is a shame and disgrace to the American Congress that this thing can be carried on day after day. I am ashamed of the part I have been compelled to take in it, in sitting here unresistingly while others are away solely for pleasure, and I give notice now that I take part in it no longer and that there will be a quorum present here to transact the public business if gentlemen who think as I do will join with me in demanding it and will stand by that demand, as I think I have the courage to do.
Now, Mr. Speaker, the second part of the resolution is necessary, because it is a part of the common law of this body that gentlemen enter into pairs, and the House recognizes them. That is proper enough under ordinary circumstances; but as we are now situated it is an abuse, and it is to prevent gentlemen who remain here being put in the position I have described that I now propose that after the meeting of the House on Monday next no pair shall be recognized, unless one of the gentlemen paired is compelled to be absent by illness. Why should we continue to permit this? What business has a member of Congress away from here for purposes of pleasure or for any other purpose, neglecting the sessions of this House and leaving one hundred and fifty or one hundred and sixty men to sit here idle, with a Calendar crowded with business which ought to be considered and acted upon one way or the other?
Mr. BLOUNT. I wish to renew my suggestion, with this remark——
Mr. PAYSON. For what reason should this clause be stricken out of the resolution? I should be very glad to make the modification, if any good reason were presented; but I confess I see not the shadow of one. I will yield to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] as many minutes as he may desire, reserving the balance of my time.
Mr. BLOUNT. The Chair has already announced that he has some doubt in relation to the latter portion of the resolution, and I can conceive a reason for that. It changes a rule of the House, and I think my friend from Illinois, even if he differs from me in this regard, might very well offer two separate resolutions. Let us first dispose of the proposition to revoke leaves of absence—about which the Chair has no doubt—and then we may take up the other resolution about which the Chair entertains some doubt. I wish to have the matter presented in this shape, because I desire that no gentleman, in voting on the proposition to revoke leaves of absence, shall be restrained by any suggestion that there is any part of the resolution we may not act upon in this way.
I am in thorough accord in thought and feeling with all that the gentleman from Illinois has uttered in regard to our present situation as to the transaction of public business. I say it is a mortifying spectacle that, in spite of the late stage of the session, we have been endeavoring for days to pass the general deficiency bill and have been restrained from doing so by reason alone of the fact that there are certain claims which are brought in question and that we are told those gentlemen who are favoring these claims ought to be sent for.
Again, sir, the President of the United States has seen fit to call the attention of both Houses of Congress to our Canadian relations. The Committee on Foreign Affairs has had referred to it the President's message with a bill relating to that subject, and by reason of the exigency of the situation leave has been granted the committee to report on that subject at any time. Yet in so grave a condition of affairs we find ourselves without a quorum to transact business. Under these grave circumstances, the point of "no quorum" is raised because of certain claims pending. Sir, shall the machinery of the Government be stopped? Nearly two months of the new fiscal year have already passed; and are we to be told that we are not to pass the general appropriation bills, that we are not to take into consideration this question of great public concern in regard to our relations with Canada, that our business is to stand perfectly still until certain absentees known to be in favor of these claims now brought in question shall have time to reach here?

Mr. DIBBLE. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BLOUNT. Certainly.

Mr. DIBBLE. The point of order is made because of a ruling which affects the question whether a solemn order of the House has been superseded or not. That is the question on which the point of "no quorum" was raised by me, because I deem it just that those who voted for the order should be present in at least as large proportion as those who voted against it. And this is a question which should be decided by a quorum of the House, inasmuch as 163 members voted for the order.

Mr. BLOUNT. I put to the gentleman the question whether that "solemn order" is so solemn that by its solemnity our relations with Canada are to be affected, and bills providing for the general expenditures of the Government retarded?

Mr. TARSNEY. Michigan will take care of Canada.

Mr. BLOUNT. I am not willing to leave that matter to Michigan.

Mr. DIBBLE. I offered my proposition to take up the deficiency bill on Tuesday, because it would obviate all this difficulty.

Mr. BLOUNT. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PAYSON] has offered a resolution looking to a relief of the present situation, and let who will oppose it. For one, sir, I have endeavored to be moderate hitherto in relation to absentees, but the time has now come when I will co-operate with other gentlemen to see that there shall be a quorum of the House present, so that the absence of a quorum shall not offer an obstruction to the consideration of important public interests.

Mr. TAULBEE. Mr. Speaker, I regret exceedingly that in consequence of my own illness and illness in my family I have been absent from the House, and that by reason of the absence of others as well as myself, for various reasons, the House has recently found itself frequently without a quorum. I am in favor of adopting such measures as will induce members to attend the meetings of the House and secure the presence of a quorum for the transaction of business. But I do not consider the remarks of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PAYSON] or those of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] pertinent in the main to the question of order which I raised against the resolution. My point did not extend to that portion of the resolution which looks to the procuring of a quorum, but to that portion which proposes to interfere with the pairs made under the rules and practice of the House. If we adopt this resolution in its present form I do not understand that it can amount to anything in respect to these pairs. Members have a right to pair or not, as they choose; and if I understand the rules, members have the power not to vote even when present.

Mr. PAYSON. The gentleman will allow me to make a suggestion which may obviate further discussion. I modify my resolution by striking out so much of it as relates to pairs and will offer that later as a separate proposition. This will save all present difficulty about the point raised by the gentleman.

Mr. TAULBEE. I should like to have the resolution read as it has been modified. Perhaps it will save further controversy.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The resolution will be read as modified.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That all leaves of absence now in force, except for illness, be revoked, to take effect at the meeting of the House on Monday next.

Mr. TAULBEE. I believe I have the floor. One suggestion and I am willing the matter shall be acted on.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I know of no right of this House which will compel a member to vote.

Mr. NELSON. We can punish a member for contempt in refusing to obey the orders of the House.

Mr. TAULBEE. True we have a rule to that effect, but in the event he does not choose to vote, although he is present in his seat, I know of no process under the rules of the House by which the House can compel him to vote. If you have a right to compel a member to vote you have the right by the same rule to indicate how he shall vote.

Mr. PAYSON. It is enough if a member is in attendance, for the rules require him to vote; and if he is present and declines to vote then the question is between him and his constituents.

Mr. TAULBEE. I am in favor of the passage of the resolution as it has been modified; and if it is necessary to do so I will withdraw my point of order.

Mr. CHEADLE. I would suggest to the gentleman to strike out "Monday" and insert "Tuesday," and I do it in behalf of members who are absent under leave of the House, and who can not reach here by Monday next.

Mr. HEARD. I hope the gentleman from Illinois will accept the modification. I agree with the gentleman from Indiana that it will be impossible for many members who are absent in the West to return to their seats by Monday next. They can not be here by Monday, and the time should be extended.

Mr. PAYSON. Many members are at neighboring watering places, who can get here by Monday next. It is necessary they should be here so business can go on at that time. As to gentlemen who are so remotely located that it is impossible for them to reach here by Monday next, when that excuse is made for them the House will unanimously grant it. I insist in the interest of the transaction of the public business the resolution shall be adopted.

Mr. HEARD. But we ought not to adopt an order which will render it impossible for members who live at so remote a distance from the capital that it will be impossible for them to be here at the time indicated. [Cries of "Vote!"]

Mr. CANNON. I very much doubt, Mr. Speaker, whether sending the Sergeant-at-Arms throughout the city to hunt up absentees will accomplish anything, and I doubt very much whether the passage of this resolution will have the effect to get members here. I know of but one way to get them here, and that is this: for the majority that organized the House and controls legislation and is responsible for it to realize its responsibility now as it should have done months ago, and get its members here, and when you get them here, my word for it the Republican minority will be on hand.

Mr. WEAVER. Do you think it is a good excuse for a member to make to state that he does not belong to the side responsible and for that reason absents himself from the sitting of the House?

Mr. CANNON. No; I do not think it is a good excuse for one elected as a member of the House to be absent from the sitting of the House unless called away on account of sickness or in case of some important emergency; nor is there any good excuse for this long session. If the majority had been reasonably efficient this session would have adjourned weeks ago. You control the House.

Mr. WEAVER. The absentees control it now.

Mr. CANNON. Get them here. But you will not do so by sending out the Sergeant-at-Arms after absentees.

Mr. WEAVER. We can make it unpleasant for them to be absent and leave the House without a quorum.

Mr. BURNES. Mr. Speaker, I wish to say a word in reply to my colleague on the Committee on Appropriations from the State of Illinois [Mr. CANNON]. In my judgment he misstates this question. This is not a political matter; this is not a party question, and I thank God for it. It is a question higher than party, higher than any consideration which influences men ordinarily.

Mr. PAYSON. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. BURNES. Wait a moment. In 1882 one of the most distinguished statesmen known in the annals of legislation took occasion in his place to tell us who it was that was responsible, and his remarks are so applicable to our present condition I beg to remind my friend from Illinois that it is not the Democratic party that is responsible for this condition of affairs on this bill; that it is not the Republican party who is responsible for the state of affairs by which we find ourselves surrounded, but it is because, in the language of a great American statesman whose name I will communicate to any gentleman who may desire it——

A MEMBER. Who is it?

Mr. BURNES. It is no less distinguished a gentleman than the Hon. JOHN SHERMAN, who said, for forty-nine years this question had been maintained by an army of nurses in Washington, and not only an army of nurses, but, to use his own language, an army of wet-nurses at that. [Laughter.]

This may be the cause of our troubles, and this may point somewhat to the party responsibility. The gentleman who has established his bureau up in the galleries of this House, and who seems to have that interest in our proceedings that the most extraordinary pecuniary considerations alone can determine——

Mr. DAVIS. I hope the gentleman will allow me to interrupt him for a question, and it is this: Whether the friends of the spoliation claims are responsible for the absence of the members of this House?

Mr. BURNES. I blame no member of this House, whether upon that side of the House or upon this; but it is our misfortune that we are divided, not as partisans, but because of the army of nurses who for forty-nine years have maintained their establishment in this town, and, as JOHN SHERMAN has put it, "wet-nurses at that."

Mr. CANNON. A word in reply to what the gentleman has just said. I did not propose to discuss the French spoliation claims or any other claims at this time. Each member of this body is responsible for his own actions and votes touching them. They stand upon their own merits, if they have any. I do not think the kind of declamation the gentleman from Missouri has just indulged in will either strengthen him in his own views or influence the views of anybody in the House or out of it as to the wisdom or unwisdom or justice or injustice of the proposed legislation.

My remarks had reference to the public business, so far as legislation is concerned, the condition thereof and the responsibility therefor.

It is notorious as a matter of fact in this House, and the country will take note of the fact, and possibly demand an explanation of it, that for at least thirty days our business here has been done practically by unanimous consent. The great appropriation bills for the public service for the year commencing the 1st of July last are not yet enacted. Much important general legislation has not yet been considered in the House. Already this is the longest session of Congress for a generation, and nothing can be now done practically except by unanimous consent. The Democratic majority does not keep a quorum here and close up the business of the session, and the Republican minority is powerless to do it.

Mr. PAYSON. What occasion is there to bring politics into the question?

Mr. CANNON. I say to my colleague, the Republican minority is not responsible for the status of legislation in the House. I will not for myself assume any responsibility for it. So far as I have power I arraign the Democratic majority for its inefficiency in the performance of its duties, in its control of the House, in its failure to enact the general appropriation bills, and in its failure to consider and enact important legislation. The Democratic majority is responsible for the condition which confronts us to-day, and it will be arraigned for its sins of commission and omission before the country and ought to be, and I believe will be condemned by the country.

Mr. PAYSON. Before moving the previous question——

Mr. DUNN. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment to allow an amendment to be read which I wish to offer?

Mr. PAYSON. I will yield long enough to permit it to be read and hear what it is.

Mr. DUNN. It is to direct the Sergeant-at-Arms to notify absent members by telegraph immediately of this order.

Mr. PAYSON. I have no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The proposed amendment will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

And that the Sergeant-at-Arms be directed to notify all absent members of this order by telegraph immediately.

Mr. PAYSON. Before moving the previous question on the adoption of the resolution, Mr. Speaker, I desire at this time to express my regret that it has been thought necessary by my colleague from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], who is nearly always right——

Mr. STEELE. And he is right at this time.

Mr. PAYSON. And possibly right now, to embark upon the sea of politics with reference to the resolution which is before the House. The question of absenteeism, I am bound to say, is as much applicable to this side of the House as to the other, and is equally bad on both.

Mr. CANNON. But we do not have control of the House.

Mr. PAYSON. And the remarks I make here to-day apply as well to my party associates as against members who should be occupying the vacant seats on the other side of the House. The motive that inspires me in the introduction of this resolution is simply one of a business character, and that alone, without regard to parties or sides of the House.

No man has a right to say that because he is a Republican, and that the Democrats are in a majority in this Chamber, that he can absent himself from the performance of his public duties because of his party relations, and because his party is not responsible for legislation. It is the business of all gentlemen who occupy seats to be here. It is a duty they owe to their constituents and to their fellow-members. It is the business of the gentleman who sits just here on my right, Governor LONG, of Massachusetts—and I refer to him by name because he is within reach of my hand, and because I am a larger man, physically, than he is and am not afraid of him [laughter]—to be here in his seat unless he is excused on account of illness by the House, just as much as it is the duty of the distinguished chairman of the Ways and Means Committee to be here, who is this afternoon addressing the "unterrified" in the city of Chicago in my own State. [Renewed laughter.]

It is not a question of party politics, but it is a question of progress in the transaction of the business of sixty millions of business people under the oath of office that we took and for the salary that is paid us and for which we agreed to come here, and I hope gentlemen in voting on this question will not be diverted from the point in this resolution because they favor or are opposed to the French spoliation claims. That cuts no figure one way or the other. This is a very business feature.

Mr. JACKSON. Will the gentleman from Illinois yield for a question?

Mr. PAYSON. This is a matter as to whether pension legislation, general or special, matters from the Public Lands Committee, which matters alone could occupy the attention of this House for ten days or two weeks, shall be considered which are now on the Calendar. Yet because under the rules of this House one gentleman has the power by the use of two words to make the point of "no quorum," it is impossible to do any business, and we have to sit idly by. It is not a matter of politics, or whether the gentlemen on the other side are in a majority of 13 or of 70; it is the business of Representatives, if not ill, to be here and assist in and make possible the transaction of business. The responsibility is on both sides.

I reserve the balance of my time, but I will yield three minutes to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. DIBBLE].

Mr. JACKSON. Will the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PAYSON] inform the House how long he has been back?

Mr. PAYSON. Yes, sir, and quickly. The gentleman from Illinois is able to say what perhaps very few other gentlemen in the House can say: This is my fourth term here, seven years of service, and, with the exception of twice that I have been to Illinois on account of death, and once, during the present session, when I was absent for a few days, I have been outside the limits of the city of Washington but three times in all these years from the time I came here at the commencement of each session until the adjournment of the House sine die. How many gentlemen can say that?

Mr. WEAVER. I can say that.

Several other MEMBERS. So can I.

Mr. PAYSON. I can say that with the exception of five days that I was in Chicago, and during which time the question of "no quorum" was not raised, and when it was the understanding between gentlemen on both sides of this House that they might go to the national conventions and that the point of "no quorum" would not be raised, I can say that I have not missed five roll-calls. Can the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. JACKSON] say as much? I would be glad to answer any other question. [Laughter.]

Mr. DIBBLE. I simply wish to say that I hope the resolution will pass, and as a remark has been made here relating to "wet nurses," I hope there will be such an attendance of the members of the House as——

Mr. PAYSON. Let me ask the gentleman not to go into that.

Mr. DIBBLE. I am not going to be led into any controversy. I hope there will be such an attendance of the members of the House that there will be found to be a quorum when this matter is decided. There is no constituency in this country but what is intelligent enough to send members here that do not require any "wet nurses" to define their position, and that have the manliness to maintain the positions which they believe to be right.

Mr. DUNN. Will the gentleman from South Carolina yield to a question?

Mr. DIBBLE. Certainly.

Mr. DUNN. Did not a quorum appear here yesterday, and did not the gentleman submit the question to a vote, and when there was no quorum did he not move to take a recess and avoid a vote after the quorum appeared?

Mr. DIBBLE. I moved to take a recess, and I stated the reasons then. I believe that the gentleman and every gentleman in the House understood them. My proposition was that a vote on this question, which is a question involving the dignity of the House, and one of far higher privilege than that of the question of claims, that it should be the imperative duty of members to be present, and I asked that a vote be taken on it at 1 o'clock on Tuesday, by which time a quorum could be present. That proposition was declined. But I shall be very glad when a fair proportion of the members of this House are here that the question shall be decided, and to that decision we will cheerfully submit, whatever the decision may be.

Mr. PAYSON. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, I wish to say but a few words. I believe this House and the country should know the reason for the interruption of all business. It is not for want of a quorum, for we have a quorum of this House in the city. On yesterday, when we reached the point of taking a vote on the question of paying these French spoliation claims——

A MEMBER. Merely on the question of order.

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. We were ready to proceed directly to a vote on the question when the point of "no quorum" was made by the friends of this measure. We then had a call of the House which showed a quorum present. When passing through the House, I heard the friends of the measure suggest that they would not vote, but that they would "break the quorum" until they could get their friends in. And when a few minutes later a vote was taken the quorum was broken in pursuance of that plan.

Mr. DIBBLE. I deny that proposition as to yesterday, so far as I am concerned.

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. I do not say that the gentleman from South Carolina did this. I have not intimated, nor do I, that he has done aught else than his duty as he understands it, fearlessly and ably.

But I do say here, Mr. Speaker, on my responsibility, that the quorum was broken in the manner and for the purpose I have stated. I heard the remarks which I have repeated made by members whom I can name.

The amount involved in these claims is very large, some say as high as $30,000,000 or $40,000,000; no one can tell just how much. But it should be understood that it is the men who seek to get so deep into the public Treasury that are interrupting the business of this House. I know no reason why this measure should be so pressed to the detriment of the important interests of the country. Certainly not because such a number of lobbyists appear to be so deeply interested. Unless I am mistaken, and unless all signs are misleading, these lobbyists are the parties most interested.

Mr. PAYSON. I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT].

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] has spoken about legislation being done here without a quorum and about important legislation remaining unconsidered. The first Congress I had the honor to serve in was a Republican Congress, and the Revised Statutes were passed in this House in that Congress at night without a quorum and when there were not exceeding twenty members in the House. The legislative appropriation bill and other important bills were considered here at night when there was no quorum present. That has happened often. There is a quorum here, and it appeared on yesterday, so that but for other reasons we could have gone on with the public business. Again, sir, no Congress has ever adjourned during the time the gentleman and I have served here without leaving important legislation which had failed to receive consideration. There never has been a different condition of things in that respect, and very likely there never will be.

Therefore the inference of the gentleman is exceedingly unjust. So far as the responsibility of the Democratic party for the present condition of things is concerned and the condemnation of it by the country by reason of that responsibility, I have been accustomed in the past to those prophecies from that side of the House in regard to the Democratic party, and they do not alarm me. I have no despondency about the future of my party. But, Mr. Speaker, I am not here to multiply partisan speech. I feel as the gentleman from Illinois does—that it is my individual responsibility, and it is the individual responsibility of every member here, without regard to party, to cease party bickerings and to do his best to see that there are members enough present to transact important public business which demands our attention. I care not whence the motion may come, I care not with whom I act in concert, so that our action is for the interests of the people of this country.

Mr. PAYSON. Mr. Speaker, I promised to yield two or three minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WEAVER].

Mr. WEAVER. I am very desirous of a vote, and I will not occupy any further time.

Mr. PAYSON. Then I move the previous question on the resolution and the pending amendments.

The motion was agreed to, and the previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That all leaves of absence now in force, except for illness, be revoked; to take effect at the meeting of the House on Monday next.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. To this resolution the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. DUNN] has offered an amendment, which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

And that the Sergeant-at-Arms be directed to notify absent members of this order by telegraph immediately.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CHEADLE] proposes to amend the resolution by striking out "Monday" and inserting "Tuesday." The question is first upon that motion.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. Speaker, before that is put, is it in order to offer a substitute for the whole resolution?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is not. The previous question has been ordered. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CHEADLE] to strike out "Monday," and insert "Tuesday."

The House divided; and there were—ayes 42, noes 44.

So the motion was rejected.

The question recurring on the amendment of Mr. DUNN, it was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was adopted.

Mr. PAYSON. I now offer, under this call, the resolution which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Speaker of the House issue the usual writ to the Sergeant-at-Arms for the arrest and production at the bar of the House of such of its members as are now absent from its sitting without its leave, as shown by the last call.

Mr. DUNN. I suggest to the gentleman from Illinois that he had better not press this proposition. I think the resolution just agreed to will accomplish every purpose.

Mr. PAYSON. We are now operating under a call of the House, without a quorum; and we can only do one of two things—either send for absentees or adjourn.

Mr. DUNN. But as I understand this resolution applies to members whose leave of absence has just been revoked.

Mr. PAYSON. Oh, no; the resolution adopted a few moments ago does not take effect until noon on Monday. This resolution applies only to those members absent at this time without leave.

Mr. DUNN. We know at any rate that nothing can be accomplished to-day.

Mr. BLOUNT. We can stay here and see.

Mr. BURNES. I believe a quorum is present in the House now; and if the Sergeant-at-Arms will gather in those members who are present in the city we shall probably have a quorum for the transaction of business to-day.

Mr. ALLEN, of Mississippi. I move to amend this resolution by striking out the words "as shown by the last call."

Mr. BLOUNT. Is there objection to modifying this resolution so as not to apply to members who are now present? A number of members have come in since the roll was called.

A MEMBER. They can report to the Clerk.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state that under a rule adopted this session, but not published in the book of rules, members who voluntarily appear during a call of the House are allowed, unless otherwise ordered by the House, to report to the Clerk and have their names enrolled.

Mr. ALLEN, of Mississippi. I stand reported. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is upon the amendment of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. ALLEN].

Mr. ALLEN, of Mississippi. I withdraw the amendment. I had read the rules as printed, but I had not read this unreported rule.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me we should not be unnecessarily hasty in this matter. There is reason to believe that the revocation of leaves of absence will promptly add to the attendance of members. More than that, as shown by the call upon successive days, there is a quorum here. The lack of a quorum upon the votes we take does not arise from the actual absence of a quorum, but from the complication of our business in reference to the French spoliation claim. Gentlemen knew very well that we might have present fifty more members than a quorum, and yet those who are the earnest advocates of this claim (which I am not proposing to criticise in any sense) would upon future occasions, as they have done in the immediate past, break that quorum, until we should have present a quorum constituted of a majority of the friends of that measure.

Mr. DIBBLE. Does the gentleman understand that I have proposed to indicate a certain day and period—1 o'clock on Tuesday next—for the taking of a vote?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. And is not the gentleman as fully aware as I am of the fact that he has no power to get that day fixed? The antagonists of this claim will break a quorum when he attempts to fix a day. It is this claim—not the question of quorum or no quorum—that constitutes the impediment to the regular transaction of the ordinary business of the House.

Mr. BURNES. That is true.

Mr. DIBBLE. Then I understand the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE] to say that those who oppose these claims would make the point of "no quorum" if the House should happen to have a majority in favor of the claims?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. I believe they would. As I stated before, I do not propose to criticise the claims, and I am not criticising those who oppose them. I am simply calling attention to the unfortunate fact that we have an angry dispute about a claim which involves at least many millions of dollars. That is the trouble; and I do not see how a quorum is going to remove that difficulty, as the earnest advocates in the dispute on the one side or the other have the power to break a quorum until there can be brought about that condition, difficult to obtain, when we shall have present a quorum of gentlemen who are in favor of the claims.

Mr. DIBBLE. But I call the gentleman's attention to the fact that a vote can be had on Tuesday next at 1 o'clock which would settle what I consider a much more important question; that is, whether an order solemnly made by the House has been superseded.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. Precisely; but yesterday when there was a quorum that question could have been settled, but in a manner adverse to the gentleman, and he then, as I understand, fled the issue in the face of a quorum. Therefore, sir, the solution of this dilemma is not in procuring a quorum, because it must be a certain character of a quorum or else nothing will be permitted to be done. It is necessary we should come to some understanding in reference to these claims.

Mr. DIBBLE. It is shown by calls of the House 169 members have answered, which is more than a quorum; and when a quorum fails to appear it is because members neglect to vote.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. In the face of the record, I think the gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. DIBBLE. I think not.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. I believe the report was that 168 or 169 members were present.

Mr. DIBBLE. There was equality in the voting on each side. I concede the gentleman's side——

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. The gentleman does not know what side I am on. I am without positive conviction as to what should be done with these claims. The gentleman knows in all these contests I have refrained from voting because I have grave doubts as to what should be done. I would be glad if this could go over until the next Congress, and be more carefully considered. Doubtless there are many gentlemen who are in doubt about it as I am.

But, sir, as to the difficulty in our proceeding, the presence of this claim is the difficulty, and it is not a mere matter of a quorum, and when we consider that is the difficulty we may solve the question of a quorum, as that question pure and simple has been solved at different times in preceding Congresses, without still having solved the special question at this time of the claims. In view of that I think it is unnecessary to resort to hasty and harsh legislation in summoning members here, when, after all, we have no guaranty that it will solve the trouble.

Mr. PAYSON. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. Certainly.

Mr. PAYSON. Is not this the ordinary resolution which has been offered when the object is to secure the transaction of the public business? Is not this the only way in which it can be accomplished?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. I think it is harsh and hasty.

Mr. PAYSON. What does the gentleman suggest instead of it?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. I would suggest that the action we have taken repealing leaves of absence is sufficient for the present. Members are out over the country and they will return, and that is all that is necessary in addition to the customary mode of proceeding for obtaining a quorum; and better still is to try and defer the consideration of these claims to some time when we may reasonably expect a full House and the public business will not suffer by delay.

Mr. PAYSON. But that is not quite the situation at this moment.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. I do not understand the gentleman.

Mr. PAYSON. There is this question of the want of a quorum pressing at this time, and it merely directs the Sergeant-at-Arms to compel the attendance of absent members.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. Do I understand the gentleman to say that this merely proposes to compel the attendance of absent members who are now in the city?

Mr. PAYSON. That is all.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. I have no objection to that.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the resolution as modified.

Mr. STONE, of Missouri. I move that my colleague [Mr. HUNTER], on account of illness, be granted leave of absence.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

Mr. BLOUNT. I ask by unanimous consent there may be another call of the House. Gentlemen are satisfied a quorum is present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is informed by the Clerk that 158 members are recorded as present.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I ask by unanimous consent that indefinite leave of absence be granted to Mr. MCKINLEY, who has been summoned home on account of the illness of his wife.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is in doubt whether indefinite leave of absence can be granted at this time.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Then I ask that Mr. MCKINLEY be granted leave of absence.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

Mr. ALLEN, of Michigan. I move that leave of absence be granted to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS] who was called away by the illness of his daughter; and also that the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WHITING] be granted leave of absence as he was called away to get up a speech for the Thurman meeting. [Laughter.] I move each of those gentlemen be excused for one week.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

Mr. GEAR. I ask unanimous consent that leave of absence be granted to my colleague [Mr. KERR]. He has met with quite a misfortune by the burning of his two houses, printing press, and other property, night before last, and it is necessary that he should go home to adjust the losses with the insurance companies. I ask that he be excused for ten days.

There was no objection.

Mr. DUNN. Mr. Speaker, for the purpose of getting out of the present embarrassment, I ask unanimous consent that the deficiency bill be recommitted to the Committee on Appropriations.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state that in the condition in which the House now finds itself that request would not be in order.

Mr. DUNN. I have asked unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair thinks that even by unanimous consent, in this condition of the House, no business can be transacted.

Mr. BURNES. I will state to the gentleman from Arkansas that personally I have no objection to his request.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. BLOUNT. And on that motion I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 46, nays 89, not voting 189; as follows:

So the House refused to adjourn.

Mr. ADAMS. I am paired with a gentleman who is absent, but I consider that the pair does not apply to a motion to adjourn.

Mr. HERBERT. I withdraw my vote; I am paired with the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. HAYDEN]. I have been voting, as under the pair when the question of a quorum was raised that right was reserved. But in this case I understand the question of a quorum does not arise.

On motion of Mr. DUNN, by unanimous consent, the reading of the names was dispensed with.

Mr. ADAMS. I am informed that some gentlemen suppose there is some connection between this vote and the French spoliation claims. I therefore withdraw my vote, although I do not see the connection.

Mr. BYNUM. I am paired with my colleague from Indiana, Mr. OWEN, and withdraw my vote, the question of a quorum not coming up here.

The following pairs were announced on all questions until further notice:

Mr. BRYCE with Mr. ATKINSON.

Mr. LANDES with Mr. MORRILL.

Mr. SIMMONS with Mr. ARNOLD.

Mr. GAY with Mr. HIRES.

Mr. DOUGHERTY with Mr. STEPHENSON.

The following were announced as being paired on all political questions until further notice:

Mr. HAYES with Mr. FELTON.

Mr. RANDALL with Mr. KELLEY.
Mr. HATCH with Mr. STEWART, of Vermont.
Mr. MCADOO with Mr. HARMER.
Mr. SENEY with Mr. ADAMS, until Tuesday next.
Mr. CRAIN with Mr. FUNSTON, on all questions for this day.
Mr. STONE, of Missouri, with Mr. GROUT, on all questions for to-day.
Mr. THOMPSON, of California, with Mr. MCKENNA, on all political questions for to-day.
Mr. COTHRAN with Mr. LONG on all political questions for two weeks.
The following are paired on all questions until further notice:
Mr. TURNER, of Georgia, with Mr. REED.
Mr. FORD with Mr. O'DONNELL.
Mr. MORSE with Mr. WHITING, of Massachusetts.
Mr. DAVIDSON, of Alabama, with Mr. PATTON.
Mr. MONTGOMERY with Mr. HUNTER.

Mr. BELMONT with Mr. DAVENPORT.
Mr. BIGGS with Mr. MORROW.
Mr. FISHER with Mr. KEAN.
Mr. COMPTON with Mr. GOFF.
Mr. GREENMAN with Mr. SHERMAN.
Mr. HAYDEN with Mr. HERBERT, on all political questions until further notice, not to apply to taxation questions or naval affairs.
Mr. COX with Mr. BAKER, of New York, on all political questions, except the Oklahoma bill.
Mr. O'FERRALL with Mr. MASON, on all political questions, except the French spoliation claims.
Mr. SOWDEN with Mr. THOMAS H. B. BROWNE, until further notice on all political questions, also on French spoliation claims. If present Mr. BROWNE would vote for the claims, Mr. SOWDEN against them.
Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts, with Mr. BACON on the French spoliation claims. If present, Mr. RUSSELL would vote for, and Mr. BACON against the claims.
Mr. GIBSON with Mr. MACDONALD on French spoliation claims. If present, Mr. GIBSON would vote for the claims and Mr. MACDONALD against them.
Mr. LEE with Mr. PEEL on French spoliation claims. If present, Mr. LEE would vote for the claims, Mr. PEEL against them.
Mr. ANDERSON, of Iowa, with Mr. DINGLEY, on the French spoliation claims. If present, Mr. DINGLEY would vote for the claims; Mr. ANDERSON would vote against them.
Mr. ROGERS with Mr. SHAW on the French spoliation claims. If present, Mr. SHAW would vote for the claims, Mr. ROGERS against them.
Mr. MARSH with Mr. ALLEN, of Massachusetts, on the French spoliation claims. If present, Mr. ALLEN would vote for the appropriation, Mr. MARSH against it.
Mr. COX with Mr. SPOONER on the French spoliation claims. If present, Mr. SPOONER would vote for the appropriation; Mr. COX would vote against it.
Mr. O'FERRALL with Mr. WASHINGTON on the French spoliation claims. Mr. O'FERRALL, if present, would vote "ay," Mr. WASHINGTON "no."
Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota, with Mr. DALZELL on the French spoliation claims. If present, Mr. DALZELL would vote for the claims, Mr. WILSON against them.
Mr. HARE with Mr. COLLINS on the French spoliation claims. If present, Mr. COLLINS would vote for the claims, Mr. HARE against them.
Mr. LANDES with Mr. WHITE, of New York, on the French spoliation claims. If present, Mr. WHITE would vote for the claims, Mr. LANDES against them.
Mr. HUDD with Mr. FITCH on the French spoliation claims. Mr. HUDD would vote against the bill and Mr. FITCH for it.
Mr. ROGERS. I am announced as being paired. The pair extends only to the French spoliation claims.
Mr. WASHINGTON. I am paired with Mr. O'FERRALL on the spoliation claims alone, but not to interfere with the right to vote to make a quorum.
Mr. BACON. I observe that the Clerk read a pair between myself and Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. We are paired on the French spoliation claims. I desire to say that I understand that that was to apply only to the vote directly upon these claims.
Mr. WISE. It is announced that I am paired with the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BOUTELLE]. Under our agreement, I feel that I have the right to vote to adjourn.
Mr. MACDONALD. I understand that I was announced as being paired with Mr. GIBSON. We were paired last week, but I understood that pair to be disposed of.
The SPEAKER pro tempore. The pair read was only upon the French spoliation claims.
The result of the vote was announced as above reported.
Mr. HENDERSON, of North Carolina. I ask unanimous consent that the House take a recess until Monday at 11 o'clock.
The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state that is not in order at this time.
Mr. KEAN. I understand that a pair was read in my name. I am not paired with any one to my knowledge.
Mr. COWLES. I move that all further proceedings under the call be dispensed with.
The motion was rejected.
Mr. HOVEY. I move that the House do now adjourn.
The question was taken; and the Speaker pro tempore declared that the ayes seemed to have it.
Mr. BLOUNT. Let us have the yeas and nays.
The yeas and nays were ordered—ayes 20, noes 72.
The question was taken; and there were—yeas 64, nays 66, not voting 194; as follows:

So the House refused to adjourn.

On motion of Mr. JACKSON, by unanimous consent, the reading of the names was dispensed with.

The result of the vote was announced as above reported.

Mr. BURNES. I have become perfectly satisfied, so far as I am concerned, that a further struggle for a quorum to-day would be ineffective. I am not in favor, therefore, of attempting to obtain a quorum to-day, and I ask unanimous consent to move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. TRACEY. I shall vote against that.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman object? Is there objection to the motion of the gentleman from Missouri. [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The question was put and the motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 3 o'clock and 38 minutes) the House adjourned.

PRIVATE BILLS INTRODUCED AND REFERRED.

Under the rule private bills of the following titles were introduced and referred as indicated below:

By Mr. A. C. THOMPSON: A bill (H. R. 11267) granting a pension to Jacob Thompson—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. LEHLBACH: A bill (H. R. 11268) for the relief of John G. Rose—to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

By Mr. RICHARDSON: A bill (H. R. 11269) for the relief of Mrs. Fanny P. Murfree—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. LAFFOON: A bill (H. R. 11270) for the relief of Rebecca S. Clark—to the Committee on War Claims.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as follows:

By Mr. BLAND: Petition of Frank Richardson, of Gasconade County, Missouri, for reference of his claim to the Court of Claims—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. GEAR: Affidavits in the case of Ellen D. Scott, for a pension—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. LAIDLAW: Petition of citizens of New York relating to pension legislation—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. LYNCH: Petition of 76 citizens of the Twelfth district of Pennsylvania, for prohibition in the District of Columbia—to the Select Committee on the Alcoholic Liquor Traffic.

Also, petition of citizens of Lackawanna County, Pennsylvania, for amendment to the interstate-commerce law—to the Committee on Commerce.

Also, petition of the Junior Order of United American Mechanics of Taylorport, Pa., to make February 22 a legal holiday—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The following petition for the repeal or modification of the internal-revenue tax of $25 levied on druggists was received and referred to the Committee on Ways and Means:

By Mr. W. C. P. BRECKINRIDGE: Of W. U. Averill and other citizens of Kentucky.

The following petition indorsing the per diem rated service-pension bill, based on the principle of paying all soldiers, sailors, and marines of the late war a monthly pension of 1 cent a day for each day they were in the service, was referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions:

By Mr. DAVENPORT: Of citizens of Steuben County, New York.

SENATE.

MONDAY, August 27, 1888.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of Friday last was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented a petition of citizens of Mitchell County, Kansas, praying for the passage of a bill providing for the payment of claims for Indian depredations to citizens of Kansas; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

He also presented a petition of citizens of Montcalm County, Michigan, praying for the passage of certain amendments to the interstate-commerce act; which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. VANCE, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1098) for the relief of the Sisters of the Holy Cross in the city of Washington, D. C., reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 3357) referring the claim of William F. Wilson to the Court of Claims, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2714) for the relief of Thomas Lannigan, reported it without amendment.

Mr. STEWART, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2996) to confirm the title of the heirs or legal representatives of Henry Volcker, deceased, to a certain tract of land in the Territory of New Mexico, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 6394) for the relief of Hayem & Taylor, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2196) for the relief of S. T. Marshall, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. PLUMB. I am instructed by the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. 858) to forfeit lands granted to the State of Michigan to aid in the construction of a railroad from Marquette to Ontonagon, in said State, to report it with amendments. I give notice that within a few days I shall ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. PLUMB, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. 239) confirming titles to certain lands in Columbia County, State of Florida, asked that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the bill, and that it be postponed indefinitely; which was agreed to.

Mr. PLUMB. I am instructed by the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred a petition of the State Agricultural College of Florida on the same general subject as the bill just reported, to report it with the recommendation that the committee be discharged from its further consideration and that the petition lie on the table.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. PLUMB, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was recommitted the bill (S. 1585) providing for the location of scrip issued under the acts of August 31, 1852, and June 22, 1860, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was agreed to, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. HALE. I desire, for the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER], who is absent, to file a report in his behalf to accompany the bill (S. 744) providing that the law regulating the pay and retirement of warrant officers in the Navy shall be construed to apply to the thirty-four officers serving as mates in the Navy, heretofore reported by him. I ask that the report be filed with the papers accompanying the bill and printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be so ordered.

Mr. PASCO, from the Committee on Claims, to whom were referred the following bills, submitted adverse reports thereon; which were agreed to, and the bills were postponed indefinitely:

A bill (S. 2132) for the relief of Catherine Woodruff; and

A bill (S. 2970) for the relief of Calvin J. Cowles and George B. Hanna.

Mr. TELLER. I am directed by the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2621) to protect purchasers of lands lying in the vicinity of Denver, Colo., heretofore withdrawn by the executive department of the Government as lying within the limits of certain railroad grants, and afterward held to lie without such limits, to report it adversely, a bill having been already passed on that subject to accomplish the purpose in view.

The adverse report was agreed to, and the bill indefinitely postponed.

Mr. TELLER. I am also directed by the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2510) to amend an act entitled "An act authorizing the citizens of Colorado, Nevada, and the Territories to fell and remove timber on the public domain for mining and domestic purposes," approved June 3, 1878, to report it adversely. Another bill is reported in its place. I move that the bill be postponed indefinitely.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. TELLER, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2877) authorizing the citizens of Colorado, Nevada, and the Territories to fell and remove timber on the public domain for mining and domestic purposes, reported it with amendments.

Mr. DOLPH, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. 3475) granting the use of certain lands in Pierce County, Washington Territory, to the city of Tacoma for the purposes of a public park, reported it without amendment.

Mr. HAWLEY, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 3482) to enable parties to construct, maintain, and operate a wagon-road to the top of Pike's Peak, in the State of Colorado, reported it without amendment.

The message further announced that the House had passed a bill (S. 2825) granting an increase of pension to Benjamin T. Baker with an amendment; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also announced that the House had agreed to the amendment of the Senate to the joint resolution (H. Res. 201) to correct an error in the act making an appropriation for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1889, and for other purposes.

The message further announced that the House had elected Hon. CHARLES F. CRISP, a Representative from the State of Georgia, as Speaker pro tempore during the temporary absence of the Speaker.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker pro tempore of the House had signed the enrolled bill (H. R. 10556) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1889, and for other purposes; and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. DAVIS introduced a bill (S. 3488) for the relief of the sureties of John S. Watrous, deceased; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. BLAIR introduced a bill (S. 3489) to increase the pension of Mary A. Bedel; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. MCPHERSON introduced a bill (S. 3490) granting a pension to Lewis McAllister, late fireman in the United States Navy; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. COCKRELL introduced a bill (S. 3491) to carry out the findings of the Court of Claims in the case of Sarah E. B. Smith; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

EFFECT OF IRRIGATION ON LOWER VALLEYS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further morning business, the Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over from a previous day, which will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution submitted by Mr. PLUMB August 21, 1888, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be directed to inquire and report to the Senate at its next session the extent to which the diversion of the waters of the Platte and Arkansas Rivers and their tributaries in Colorado, for irrigation or other purposes, affects the flow of the water of those streams in the lower valleys, and especially during the growing season; and whether the title conveyed by the Government to lands fronting on said streams covers the privilege of diverting water therefrom beyond that necessary for use thereon for irrigation and mining purposes, and to report what action is needed to protect the rights of riparian owners along the course of said streams in the States of Kansas and Nebraska.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. The Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] on a former day expressed his desire to be present when the resolution should be considered, inasmuch as it was his purpose to offer an amendment to it. I do not see him in his seat at this moment.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I ask unanimous consent that the resolution go over, retaining its place, to come up again.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be so ordered, if there be no objection.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask the Chair to lay before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives on the Army appropriation bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a message from the House of Representatives, which will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, August 23, 1888.

Resolved, That the House non-concur in the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 10234) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1889, and for other purposes.

Mr. ALLISON. The conference report on the Army appropriation bill was agreed to by the Senate some days ago, and it has been disagreed to by the House of Representatives. It embraced a large number of amendments, some of which were receded from by the Senate and the disagreement to others was receded from by the House conferees. In sending the report here it is disclosed that the House insist upon their disagreement to four amendments without taking into account the other amendments which are in the air, the House having disagreed to the report.

I should be glad to take the advice of the Chair on the subject. I do not see my way clear to reach a conclusion respecting it. The House insist upon their disagreement to four amendments and have not appointed conferees, whereas there are perhaps thirty-four amendments that are neither disagreed to nor agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There are two messages from the House bearing the same date. Both messages will be read, so that the matter can be fairly presented to the Senate.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, August 23, 1888.

Resolved, That the House non-concur in the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 10234) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1889, and for other purposes.

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, August 23, 1888.

Resolved, That the House insists upon its disagreement to the Senate amendments 26, 27, 33, and 35 to the bill (H. R. 10234) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1889, and for other purposes, and asks a further conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The House having non-concurred in the report of the committee of conference, the amendments are all open, the same, the Chair thinks, as if no report had been agreed on by the former conferees. The Chair thinks it is entirely competent for the Senate to agree to the request of the House of Representatives for a conference on the four amendments named in the message.

Mr. EDMUNDS. But so far as the record goes, it does not show any action of the House upon the other thirty-odd amendments.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It shows that the report of the committee of conference dealing with those amendments was disagreed to; therefore the Chair thinks that the whole thirty-five amendments are open between the two Houses.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The present request for a conference is only on four amendments that are named by number.

Mr. ALLISON. The message from the House discloses that they still insist upon their disagreement to four particular amendments inserted by the Senate. Now, what becomes of the other amendments that were inserted by the Senate?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. They are open between the two Houses.

Mr. ALLISON. They are still open between the two Houses?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. They are still open between the two Houses. The Chair thinks it is entirely competent for the House of Representatives to ask for a conference on the four amendments, leaving the others to be disposed of hereafter.

Mr. ALLISON. I move that the Senate still further insist upon its amendments, not only the four amendments, but all of them, and agree to the conference asked for by the House of Representatives.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa moves that the Senate still further insist upon all the amendments made in the Senate to the bill of the House of Representatives, and agree to the request of the House for a conference upon the four amendments that have been enumerated. It will be so ordered if there be no objection.

Mr. ALLISON. Now, I will add to the motion that the Senate request a conference on the remaining amendments.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa moves that the Senate request a conference with the House of Representatives upon the amendments not enumerated. It will be so ordered, if there be no objection. Upon the four amendments on which the conference is requested by the Senate, how shall the managers on the part of the Senate be appointed? ["By the Chair."] The Chair appoints Mr. ALLISON, Mr. PLUMB, and Mr. GORMAN.

Mr. EDMUNDS. And on the others?

Mr. ALLISON. On the others I suppose the same conferees will be appointed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Upon the other amendments the same managers are appointed.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. ALLISON. I present the conference report on the sundry civil appropriation bill, being House bill 10540, and I ask that it may be printed in the RECORD. I give notice that to-morrow morning I shall ask the Senate to consider this report. I will say to Senators that if they will take the House print of the bill and compare the numbered amendments with the report, they can see what the conferees have done with respect to the amendments.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think the Senate had better have the conference report printed as a document as well, because we can get it in that way earlier than we shall in the RECORD.

Mr. ALLISON. Very well.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be so ordered, if there be no objection.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The message of the House had better be read, so that the Journal will show that the bill is before the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The title of the bill will be read and the conference report announced, and it will then be printed without reading, if there be no objection.

Mr. EDMUNDS. All right.

The CHIEF CLERK. A bill (H. R. 10540) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1889, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The conference report will be printed in the RECORD and also separately as a document.

The report is as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on certain amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 10540) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1889, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 6, 7, 8, 11, 12, 18, 22, 24, 25, 26, 27, 28, 29, 30, 31, 32, 33, 36, 37, 38, 39, 40, 41, 42, 43, 48, 51, 61, 63, 70, 71, 72, 73, 82, 83, 117, 125, 132, 139, 140, 144, 150, 151, 159, 167, 198, 202, 211, 218, 220, 225, and 237.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 3, 4, 10, 13, 14, 15, 16, 17, 20, 21, 23, 34, 35, 44, 45, 46, 47, 49, 50, 52, 53, 55, 57, 58, 59, 64, 66, 67, 68, 69, 81, 87, 88, 89, 90, 91, 93, 94, 95, 108, 109, 120, 126, 131, 135, 136, 137, 138, 142, 143, 145, 146, 147, 152, 155, 156, 157, 158, 160, 173, 195, 197, 200, 201, 206, 210, 212, 213, 215, 217, and 224, and agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 2: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 2, and agree to same with amendments as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed in said amendment insert "$75,000," and strike out of said amendment the word "completion" and insert in lieu thereof the word "commencement;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 19: That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House to Senate amendment numbered 19, and agree to the same with amendments as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed in said House amendment insert "$50,000," and add after said House amendment the following:

"For court-house, custom-house, and post-office at Brownsville, Tex.: For purchase of site and completion of building, $50,000.

"For court-house and post-office at Charlotte, N. C.: For purchase of site and completion of building, $85,000.

"For post-office at Ottumwa, Iowa: For purchase of site and completion of building, $40,000.

"For court-house and post-office at Statesville, N. C.: For purchase of site and completion of building, $75,000."

And the House agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 54: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 54, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following: "establishing and completing;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 56: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 56, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$15,000," and add at the end of the amended paragraph the following: "Provided, That no oil-house erected hereunder shall exceed $500 in cost;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 62: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 62, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed in said amendment insert "$16,000;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 65: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 65, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$925,000;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 74: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 74, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: After the word "Louisiana," in line 5, page 15 of the bill, insert the following: "At Chicot Pass and to mark navigable channel along Grand Lake, Louisiana;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 76: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 76, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed in said amendment insert "$1,800;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 77: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 77, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed in said amendment insert "$1,800;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 207: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 207, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$2,088,944.60;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 214: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 214, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$10,000;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 219: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 219, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$5,000;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 231: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 231, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out all after the word "Representatives" where it last occurs in said amendment and insert in lieu of the matter so stricken out the following:

"And hereafter payments made upon vouchers approved by the aforesaid respective committees shall be deemed, held, and taken, and are hereby declared, to be conclusive upon all the Departments and officers of the Government: Provided, That no payment shall be made from said contingent funds as additional salary or compensation to any officer or employé of the Senate or House of Representatives."

And the Senate agree to the same.

On amendments numbered 105, 106, 107, 110, 116, 118, 119, 121, 127, 128, 221, 223, 233, 234, 236, 238, 239, 240, 242, 243, 244, 248, 254, 255, 256, and 257 the committee of conference have been unable to agree.

ALLEGED TIMBER DEPREDATIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate another resolution coming over from a former day, which will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution submitted by Mr. STEWART August 23, 1888, as follows:

Resolved, That the Commissioner of the General Land Office be, and he is hereby, directed to furnish the Senate without delay with copies of all reports, affidavits, and communications upon which he based the statements in his letter to Hon. JAMES N. BURNES, of the House of Representatives, dated August 18, 1888, with regard to the following amendment to the sundry civil appropriation bill:

"That no part of the money appropriated by this act shall be used in the investigation of any case or the prosecution of any person in the mining region of the United States for cutting, for mining or domestic purposes, dwarfed or scrubby timber unfit to be sawed or hewed into lumber of commercial value."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. BECK. I have no objection to the resolution if the words are added "if not inconsistent with the good of the public service."

Mr. STEWART. I am opposed to the insertion of any such words.

Mr. BECK. I have no doubt the Senator is.

Mr. STEWART. I am certainly opposed to it. I do not believe it is possible for it to be inconsistent with the public service to have this matter thoroughly investigated.

Mr. BECK. All I know about it, if the Senator will allow me, is that a communication came to me as a member of the committee of conference on the sundry civil appropriation bill the other day which I handed to Mr. BURNES, of the House, and I have not got it with me now, in which the Commissioner of the General Land Office said that he had commenced two suits against two great corporations, and that if the information required by this resolution was given out it would just develop all the claim that the United States had and put it in the hands of two great corporations, one of them a foreign corporation, to break down the case. He said he might as well abandon the suits as to develop all the ground that he had for the prosecution against the corporations, and he insisted that it was not fair to the United States to make him lay before the country and before the corporations he is sueing the facts upon which he relied; and if that was done he would have to abandon the cases.

That was stated in his official communication, which I handed to Mr. BURNES. I did not know this matter would come up this morning and I have not got the communication with me now.

Therefore I say the words "if inconsistent with the good of the public service" ought to be inserted, because we ought not to break down the case of the United States in advance.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think the Senator from Kentucky is right in the substance of his statement, though I should not wish to put it in that form. I will move to amend by inserting——

Mr. STEWART. I should like to be heard before any action is taken.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I will make my motion, and then the Senator can be heard. I do not think the Senator from Nevada will object to the amendment I propose. I move to insert after the word "communications," in line 3, the words "except such as in his opinion ought to be withheld for the purposes of justice."

Mr. BECK. That is all the Commissioner wants.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The proposed amendment will first be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 3, after the word "communications," it is proposed to insert "except such as in his opinion ought to be withheld for the purposes of justice;" so as to read:

Resolved, That the Commissioner of the General Land Office be, and he is hereby, directed to furnish the Senate without delay with copies of all reports, affidavits, and communications, except such as in his opinion ought to be withheld for the purposes of justice, upon which he based the statements in his letter to Hon. JAMES N. BURNES, of the House of Representatives, dated August 18, 1888, with regard to the following amendment to the sundry civil appropriation bill:

"That no part of the money appropriated by this act shall be used in the investigation of any case or the prosecution of any person in the mining region of the United States for cutting, for mining or domestic purposes, dwarfed or scrubby timber, unfit to be sawed or hewed into lumber of commercial value."

Mr. EDMUNDS. Now, Mr. President, in support of that amendment I wish to say a single word.

The putting in a resolution of this kind of an exception like this is not new in the Senate. On two or three occasions in former years information of this character has been moved for from some Department or other, and when there was a suggestion made by any Senator that matters in the course of judicial administration were still pending and depending upon that information, we have always thought it right for the interests of the United States and of justice to leave it to the Department officer to withhold such papers as were still confidential and were necessary to be kept confidential in order that the purposes of justice might be subserved. It might happen—very likely it is not so in this case, but we ought to act upon the principle—it might happen that some of these very affidavits that are referred to, if there be any, being disclosed would lead to the escape of the culprit whom they are now getting ready to arrest, or would enable, as the Senator from Kentucky says, some great corporation to get rid of the witnesses who had given the affidavits in advance. It seems to me, therefore, obvious that we ought not to compel the administrative department of the Government to disclose the testimony that it has in preparation for the trial of a cause.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, this is the third raid made upon the miners in the last twenty-five years. In 1865–'66 a scheme was very popular in some sections of the country, laboring entirely under a misapprehension, to sell the mines at auction, treating the miners who had located upon them as criminals. It was proposed to sell the mines at auction and pay the national debt. After the miners had, by their own exertions and under the non-action of Congress, built up the country and established rules and regulations, and a common law had grown up among them which had been recognized by the courts and by the legislatures, it was proposed to raise a large army and send it into the mining regions and eject the miners from their claims, and a resolution was passed by the House of Representatives by more than a two-thirds vote instructing the Committee on the Public Lands to prepare a bill for that purpose. But after a discussion it was found that the miners were not criminals, that they had some rights, and the scheme was defeated.

In order that the question now under consideration and its merits may be understood, it is necessary to make a short statement of the history of the situation in which those miners are, and the action of the Government towards them, to show under what circumstances a general prosecution is now proposed against all the miners who have cut timber on the public lands for fire-wood.

In 1866 this question of the rights of the miners, whether they should be treated as criminals or whether their situation should be recognized and accepted. was thoroughly discussed in the two Houses of Congress. One proposition was, and that was the proposition of Mr. Julian, of Indiana, chairman of the Committee on Public Lands of the House, to raise a large army and sell the mines at auction by legal subdivisions, without regard to the rights of those who had discovered them. The debate was lengthy. A portion of my remarks were incorporated in the appendix to the Supreme Court Reports in 3 Wallace, and I will read a few extracts from the remarks I made then:

After the admission of California as a State, in September, 1850, Mr. Frémont, then Senator from that State, introduced a bill, the purpose of which was to establish police regulations in the mines. It imposed a small tax upon the miners to defray the expenses of the system. Many Senators, when the bill came up for discussion, expressed the opinion that the mines ought to be sold, or some means devised by which a direct revenue might be obtained from that source. Various amendments were offered to effect these purposes. But Mr. Benton took a leading part in the discussion, and contended throughout that good policy required that the mines should remain free and open for exploration and development. Mr. Seward sustained Mr. Benton.

The arguments of Senators in favor of free mining finally prevailed, and all amendments looking to sale or direct revenue were voted down, and the bill finally passed the Senate, without material amendment, in its original form, but failed in the House from want of time to consider it. Before the meeting of the next Congress the fact became known that the miners themselves had adopted local rules for their own government, which rendered action on the part of Congress unnecessary; and from that time to the present non-action has been the policy of the Government, with one single exception. The solemn declaration, however, just mentioned, on the part of the Senate, in favor of a just and liberal policy to the miners, was hailed by them as a practical recognition of their possessory rights, and greatly encouraged and stimulated mining enterprise, and laid the foundation for a system of local government now in full force over a vast region of country inhabited by nearly a million men.

The Legislature of California, at their following session, in 1851, had under consideration the subject of legislation for the mines, and, after full and careful investigation, wisely concluded to declare that the rules and regulations of the miners themselves might be offered in evidence in all controversies respecting mining claims, and when not in conflict with the constitution or laws of the States or of the United States should govern the decision of the action. A series of wise judicial decisions molded these regulations and customs into a comprehensive system of common law, embracing not only mining law (properly speaking), but also regulating the use of water for mining purposes. The same system has spread over all the interior States and Territories where mines have been found, as far east as the Missouri River. The miner's law is a part of the miner's nature; he made it, and he loves it, trusts it, and obeys it. He has given the toil of his life to discover wealth, which, when found, is protected by no higher law than that enacted by himself, under the implied sanction of a just and generous Government. Miners as a community devote three-fourths of their aggregate labor to exploration, and consequently are, and ever will remain, poor, while individuals amass large fortunes, and the treasury of the world is augmented and replenished.

This view of the case, that it would unjustly disturb the people, prevailed, and Congress was so strongly impressed with the facts that a bill passed both Houses, after a full discussion, fully recognizing their rights.

It was supposed as a matter of course that the right to mine as they were then doing carried with it the right to cut the necessary timber in the mining regions, which practice has been pursued without interruption, and it was presumed that it was lawful under the general laws for selling the mines and giving the right to work them. It was claimed that confirming the miners' rights, providing for their obtaining patents, and recognizing the system carried with it all the necessary incidents, and one was to cut the necessary timber to work the mines.

This proceeded uninterruptedly until 1878, when Mr. Schurz was Secretary of the Interior, and he undertook a system of reform. He started a reform administration, and as a part of the machinery of reform he sent his agents all over the Territories arresting miners for cutting wood with which to mine or to cook their meals. He had them arrested in the various Territories, and finally in the dead of winter he went to Montana and stopped the cutting of wood when the thermometer was at 35° below zero and the people could not live without it. He went there at that time, I say, and stopped the cutting of wood.

On that occasion, through the efforts of Mr. Sargent and Mr. Blaine, a law was passed which it was supposed was entirely sufficient to cover this question. Senators sometimes marvel why Mr. Blaine became so popular in the Western country. I will tell you why. It was for two speeches. One was his speech when he recognized the fact that the people on that coast could not live in company with Chinese, that where the Chinese came they destroyed American civilization. He recognized that fact and proclaimed it. When the people found that they were to be deprived of wood in the dead of winter by a new construction of what was supposed to be their right, he again came to their rescue and defended them in a speech which I have here. Before reading extracts from the speech of Mr. Blaine I shall first call the attention of the Senate to the report of the Committee on Public Lands of the Senate which resulted in the passage of the law allowing the miners to cut timber for mining and domestic purposes:

The committee have carefully considered the subject of timber and timber lands, and, after mature deliberation, with the view of devising the best methods of preserving, cultivating, and disposing of the same, have come to the conclusion that a distinction should be made between such trees as grow upon the mountains in the mineral districts and the forests of pine, oak, and other timber that grow in the more level portions of the country.

While the lumber of the latter is a regular and important article of commerce and is constantly being cut and transported in large quantities to ready markets, the character of the former renders the timber unfit for commercial purposes. Even were this otherwise, it is usually found in such inaccessible places as to preclude its transportation to market. Consequently it is used by the prospector, the miner, and other members of mining communities for domestic and other practical purposes incidental to the development of mineral districts. The committee do not believe that it would be wise policy on the part of the Government to seek to profit directly by the sale of this kind of timber nor to tax the pioneer by compelling him to purchase it. Except as a source of revenue by sale to the settler, it never can be of any value to the Government. Should the experiment be tried of requiring payment for it, it would be found that the cost of keeping agents for its sale and officers to prevent or punish infractions of the law at remote and widely separated settlements would largely consume all sums received for his timber by the Government. Thus, while it is practically of but little value to the Government, it is essential to the settler and indispensable to his occupation and development of the mineral lands. It has been the custom of Congress to encourage the exploration and development of the mineral regions of the United States; and in this connection it should be borne in mind that it is mainly to the indomitable energy, hardihood, and daring of the pioneer that we are indebted for the discovery and development of the rich gold and silver districts of the country. What would be the condition of this country to-day had it not been for our product of gold and silver during the last quarter of a century? The $100,000,000 annually added by the United States to the world's stock of bullion will amply pay for the use of the scattering timber found in those localities. Instead of imposing this timber as a tax upon this important branch of industry, the committee are of opinion that, under the restrictions provided in this bill and on the grounds of equity and public policy, the Government should allow its free use by the actual settler for the purposes alluded to herein.

In 1866 Congress, by express statute, authorized the occupation and use of these mineral lands, as follows:

"Be it enacted, etc., That the mineral lands of the public domain, both surveyed and unsurveyed, are hereby declared to be free and open to exploration and occupation by all citizens of the United States and those who have declared their intention to become citizens, subject to such regulations as may be prescribed by law, and subject also to the local customs and rules of miners in the several mining districts, so far as the same may not conflict with the laws of the United States."

This is an express grant by the Government to the people who occupy this portion of the public domain. There was no law by which settlers could purchase either the timber necessary for such occupation or the land upon which that timber is found. It is a well-settled principle applied to grants that the grant carries with it all the incidents necessary to enable the grantee to make the grant available. It is absolutely necessary for settlers to have timber for domestic use in order to enable them to occupy these mineral lands. It would have been a mockery to make this grant without including such use of timber. It can not be said that it was ever intended the occupants should pay for this timber, since no provision has ever been made for its sale or purchase. The Government is more than paid for its value by the increased wealth added by mining operations to the grand total of taxable property. In view of these considerations the committee recommend the passage of the substitute, which contains limitations and guards for the protection of undergrowth and such other restrictions as seem just and equitable.

The language of the law, so far as material to this case, which was passed in pursuance of this report is as follows:

That all citizens of the United States and other persons, bona fide residents of the State of Colorado, or Nevada, or either of the Territories of New Mexico, Arizona, Utah, Wyoming, Dakota, Idaho, or Montana, and all other mineral districts of the United States, shall be, and are hereby, authorized and permitted to fell and remove, for building, agricultural, mining, or other domestic purposes, any timber or other trees growing or being on the public lands, said lands being mineral, and not subject to entry under existing laws of the United States, except for mineral entry, in either of said States, Territories, or districts of which such citizens or persons may be at the time bona fide residents, subject to such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Interior may prescribe for the protection of the timber and of the undergrowth growing upon such lands, and for other purposes: Provided, The provisions of this act shall not extend to railroad corporations.

The aggravating circumstances under which this law was passed show that the present case is but a repetition of the persecutions then inaugurated by the Secretary of the Interior.

The remarks of Senator Blaine are too long to read in full, but I shall read a few of them to show the then condition of things and the outrages which are again proposed to be repeated. He said:

That gentleman did me the honor—

He is referring to the Delegate from Montana, Mr. Maginnis—

That gentleman did me the honor to give me one of a series of petitions, several of which he has presented to the House of Representatives, signed he states by between four and five thousand adult male citizens of that Territory, addressed very peculiarly (I suppose from the terror that the Secretary of the Interior was creating out there they were addressed in this wise):

"To the honorable the Secretary of the Interior, the Senate and House of Representatives of the Forty-fifth Congress of the United States."

You remember that Dogberry was very particular as to which name should be put down first, and the Secretary is here put down first: "To the honorable the Secretary of the Interior, the Senate and House of Representatives of the Forty-fifth Congress of the United States," the major premise first. The document may be a trifle overwrought in point of style, but I am going to detain the Senate to read this entire memorial:

"Your memorialists would respectfully represent that"—

I read this for the purpose of showing what the condition was then. I am about to compare it with the condition now—

"Your memorialists would respectfully represent that—

"Whereas the citizens of Montana have during their residence in this Territory exercised the same privileges as settlers upon the public domain as have been sanctioned and recognized by the Government and time-honored customs since the first settlement of land in the United States; and

"Whereas in the occupancy of the land in a new country, where markets are not established in which to purchase the real necessaries, such as fuel, building material, etc., it is as natural to procure these in the most convenient place as it is to breathe the free air of heaven; and

"Whereas in distant Montana, while the settlers are improving and making valuable the public domain and use the wood and timber for domestic purposes only, a tax of $1 per cord on wood and $2 per thousand on lumber is levied and collected by the Government officials among us, which is onerous, unjust, and a burden to all alike; and

"Whereas it has been represented to the Government that the people here were satisfied with and acquiesced in the taxes above enumerated"—

The tax was intended to stop it—

I believe the Secretary of the Interior's report which the honorable Senator from Ohio read contained a dispatch from the United States district attorney there that they were perfectly satisfied with it—

The petition goes on—

"we positively deny that any such satisfaction exists, and, on the contrary, assert that there is universal complaint and widespread dissatisfaction, and, believing the tax exorbitant and distressing to the general consumer, we respectfully ask that the order for the levy be rescinded, and in all cases where the tax has been paid that the money be returned; and

"Whereas the orders, as interpreted by the officials here, work a total prohibition to cut wood and lumber hereafter, we respectfully ask that they be instructed to grant us the same privileges and rights in the premises as have heretofore prevailed in this and in all new Territories; and

"Whereas it is necessary in Montana to cut wood in the winter, when the timber is frozen, for the next year's consumption, the prohibition to cut wood for any purpose, as now enforced, will, in another season, leave the people without fire to keep them warm and the mills and mines profitless for want of fuel and lumber; and

"Whereas the prohibition to cut timber ignores and makes it impossible to comply with the provisions of the pre-emption laws in acquiring agricultural and mineral lands, where fencing, buildings, and occupancy are necessary to obtain title (and these cannot be done without timber from the public lands), works a great hardship to emigrants who come expecting to settle and make homes on the public domain in Montana, we respectfully and most earnestly remonstrate against any tax whatever on fuel and lumber while the people here are struggling for existence in a country cut off from the conveniences and cheap living in the States. As well might His Majesty the King of Denmark levy a royalty upon the blocks of ice with which his subjects in Upernavick construct their humble dwellings as to hamper by taxes or lack of legislation the pioneers who carve out and make valuable to the Government of the United States vast areas of land which, without their industry and heroic struggles, might remain unsold and profitless forever; and

"Whereas the timbered lands of Montana are mostly unsurveyed, and are mountainous and not suitable for tillage, they are unlike those in the prairie States, which need but to be cleared to make them more productive, while ours are found on precipitous mountain sides, totally without any value except for their rocks and fire-wood; and

"Whereas we are left without any law by which we can either pre-empt homestead or procure title to any timber land, it is evident there must be relief, and that soon, or else we will be obliged to give up our homes, quit the country, and abandon the great and growing West for a retrograde movement upon the overcrowded communities of the East.

"And, as in duty bound, we will ever pray."

Mr. Blaine goes on to give the history very well. Now, as to the history of this transaction: After this law was passed it was supposed the question was settled. The miners went on to cut timber from then until this particular raid was inaugurated. And I want my friend from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] to listen to my statement on this subject. Last January some Italians were cutting fire-wood in the high mountains in Lander County, Nevada, in the mining region. They were arrested and taken to the United States district court at Carson. They employed Mr. MacMillan, a lawyer living at Winnemucca, a gentleman of character and who was the Democratic candidate for Congress at the last election, to defend them. Mr. MacMillan wrote to me what had occurred and spoke of this statute that had been passed and stated that the arrest was in conflict with their idea of the law. I told him that the law of 1878 was the only law on the subject, and that my idea was that the statute covered the case completely and that the Italians were not liable, and that the court would so decide. The case was brought up before the district court at Carson and the prosecution was unable to prove that these Italians had cut anything but brush, which was a fact, and the court immediately dismissed the suit as no case, and the question whether they had a right to cut any kind of timber that grew in that region could not be decided. The court said these men are not guilty, and disposed of the case properly without going into any questions that did not arise in it.

I told Mr. MacMillan, however, that I would see the Commissioner of the General Land Office and would try to effect what was wanted by some arrangement, so that the construction of the law would be certain and so that there would not be any mistake of that kind afterwards occurring. I had a talk with Mr. Stockslager about it. I did not understand that he disagreed with me. About March last a transaction occurred, however, to which Mr. Stockslager alluded in another publication, which I will ask the Secretary to read.

The Secretary read as follows:

CRITICAL SENATOR STEWART—LAND COMMISSIONER STOCKSLAGER'S SUGGESTIVE REPLY TO HIS CHARGES.

WASHINGTON, August 22, 1888.

Commissioner Stockslager to-day, in speaking of Senator STEWART'S criticism of the management of the General Land Office in the Senate yesterday, said:

"If the Senator will examine the interview referred to by him and my letter to Mr. BURNES he will find that no reflection was cast upon him in either one of them. I have no quarrel with him or any other member of Congress. I simply tried to defeat the amendment because I believed it ought to be defeated. Senator STEWART'S name was not mentioned by me, except incidentally as the author of the amendment. The Senator is pleased to charge, however, that I falsely asserted that he was actuated by consideration for the mining or railroad corporations, and that I had outraged myself and disgraced my office by relying on false information to attempt to brand him thus. As before remarked, this is simply imagination.

"And yet, since the Senator has been pleased to make this statement, it might not be amiss to say that, if he will recall the fact he will remember that two gentlemen, representing some of these corporations, called at the General Land Office and were presented by him a short time ago, who, in advance of any investigation, offered to pay a large sum to compromise trespasses committed upon the public lands. He will also recall the fact that I refused to do so, upon the ground that it would be necessary to have a special agent examine and report as to the extent of the trespass, and that they then insisted upon having an immediate examination. And it was at their request a special agent was sent to Nevada. And further, that the only investigations he has made are of these and other corporations, and none have been made of the poor settlers about whom he complained. Following these facts this amendment is offered, which would practically defeat our investigation of these corporations.

"The information which I have, and which the Senator says is false, was furnished by two sworn officials of the Federal Government and citizens of Nevada, of high standing, as well as by the written admission in their proposition of compromise made by some of these corporations. Its truth or falsity will be developed if the investigation goes on. If his amendment is adopted and it is defeated it will not be known."

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, this is the first time that I have ever known an officer of the Government to go into the newspapers for the purpose of abusing a Senator for doing his duty. In this communication he denies that he did abuse me, that he did misrepresent me, that he made any attack upon me; but in order that the Senate may see how uncalled for his attack upon me has been, and how he misrepresented the facts, I must state the history of this matter a little further.

The gentlemen alluded to in the paper just read, who went with me to the Commissioner, were two lawyers from Nevada, one named Mr. Baker and the other Mr. Dorsey. Mr. Dorsey was a member of the St. Louis convention. Mr. Baker is a Republican. Both are gentlemen of high character and good lawyers. They came to this city under these circumstances: These Italians having been arrested and the question of the liability for cutting timber not having been determined by the court, and this new construction having been given to the statute, a Mr. Price (who had been the superintendent for several mining companies in Tuscarora, Nev., a place about 100 or 150 miles north of Eureka, the place alluded to by the Commissioner)—this question as to whether they were trespassers or not having been raised, Mr. Price said that as the corporations which he represented would soon be dissolved when the mines were worked out, and as he did not want to be harassed with litigation when nobody else would be responsible, he wanted to compromise for what his companies had used for fuel.

Mr. Baker and Mr. Dorsey came with the accounts of the amount of wood, etc., the companies had used in their mining operations and offered to pay 50 cents a cord. I told them I did not think the companies were liable, but they stated that they would rather pay and be out of trouble than take the chances of being prosecuted. I went with them to Mr. Stockslager, as they asked me to do, and I made to him the statement that I am now making. He stated that he declined to accept the proposition, and would send out a special agent to examine the facts. I told him that under the law they were not liable, but they wanted to settle. I showed him the law under which the companies had a right to cut timber for mining purposes, and told him that I thought this was rather a generous thing on their part, and if they would pay the money I thought he could afford to take it. He said he would send out a special agent. I told him the special agent could not find out anything but what these people would show him, because the fuel had been cut from isolated points about 40 miles around Tuscarora, and it would be impossible to find out anything in the mountains where they had cut the sticks. He sent out his agent.

On the 7th of July last, when the Committee on Appropriations were in session, I went before that committee, and, among other amendments to the sundry civil bill that I offered, I presented the following, and the committee will remember that I offered it, namely:

That no part of the money appropriated by this act shall be used in the investigation of any case or the prosecution of any person in the mining region of the United States for cutting, for mining or domestic purposes, dwarfed or scrubby timber unfit to be sawed or hewed into lumber of commercial value.

This amendment does not, as alleged by Mr. Stockslager, prevent the prosecution of railroads or other corporations for cutting lumber on the public lands, and his tirades against corporations are wholly gratuitous. It simply prevents the Commissioner from using the money appropriated by Congress for prosecuting citizens from cutting wood and brush that can not be sawed or hewed into lumber for mining and domestic purposes. Every letter and publication made by the Commissioner is a gross misrepresentation of the character of the amendment, and a disgrace to the officer who made them.

The committee did not adopt it, but said that I might offer it in the Senate. After I had appeared before the committee I met the reporter of the San Francisco Chronicle, and he asked me what I had been doing in the committee-room, as reporters always do, and I told him about the irrigation amendment and also about the amendment in question. He telegraphed this to the San Francisco Chronicle. The first time I had learned that an agent had gone to Eureka or of the contemplated suits against the Richmond and Eureka companies was by the following dispatch in the San Francisco Chronicle:

The Commissioner of the General Land Office has received a telegram from the special timber agent on duty at Eureka, Nev., to the effect that he had mailed a report of depredations on public lands by two corporations amounting to $10,000,000. The efforts to prevent appropriations to carry on these investigations, he says, should be checkmated.

This dispatch was in the San Francisco Chronicle of July 15. It reached me about July 22, two weeks after I had appeared before the Committee on Appropriations. Still the Commissioner has the audacity to officially state that the amendment was offered to stop these prosecutions, when, as I have shown, I did not know and had no means of knowing that any such proceedings were contemplated until two weeks after I had offered the amendment in the committee. The above dispatch undoubtedly was brought out by the other dispatch to the Chronicle stating that I had presented the amendment to the committee.

It would have been becoming and decent of Mr. Stockslager, when he got that dispatch from his agent, to have informed me of the fact that his agent had recommended these prosecutions, and that my amendment was, in his opinion, objectionable. He did not do so, but rushed into the papers and telegraphed it to San Francisco notwithstanding he knew I was trying to do what was right in the matter. On August 31 I offered my amendment in the Senate, and it was adopted. I offered the amendment because the people in the mining regions have the right to cut wood for mining purposes under the law. Then Mr. Stockslager, without coming to me or anybody that I know of, instead of attempting to ascertain the facts from the representatives of mining regions, attempted to make a politcial question out of this, and addressed a letter to Mr. BURNES and sent a copy of it to the Democratic member of the Senate Committee on Appropriations, Mr. BECK, and in it he uses the most severe and forcible language in relation to me. I read the following from his letter:

I am warranted in stating that it—originated in the desire to prevent the prosecution of anticipated suits which have since been ordered upon the recommendation of this office against the Richmond Mining Company and the Eureka Consolidated Mining Company, owning mines in Nevada, for the recovery of $9,917,461, the total value of wood and charcoal derived from timber cut by and for these companies upon the public lands, aggregating 1,305,964 cords of wood, from a portion of which were derived 28,704,662 bushels of charcoal.

These two companies alone have literally laid bare the hills, mountain ranges, and cañons within a radius of 35 miles from Eureka, not sparing the undergrowth, but taking everything from 3 inches and upwards, not simply "dwarfed and scrubby timber," but mahogany, cedar, and pine trees. Even the stumps of the trees have been removed.

Then he goes on in a wild harangue against railroad corporations in his long letter, although he knew there was nothing in the amendment to prevent him from prosecuting railroad corporations to his heart's content or any other corporations or persons for cutting timber fit for commercial purposes. He did not rest content with this, but gave these false charges the widest possible publicity by an interview in the New York Herald, which I read in my remarks the other day. He accused me of deceiving the Senate. The article was headed "A nigger in the wood pile," etc. There was an editorial in the same paper, based upon the interview which I also read, and which is in the RECORD of the 22d instant, in which I am denounced by the editor of the Herald. When I stated the facts in the Senate he immediately rushed into print again.

I undertake to say that Mr. Stockslager had no right to infer that my amendment had any reference to any particular company. I say that it is false from beginning to end; that I did not know that he had sent out any agent to Eureka; did not know that he had made this recommendation with regard to the Eureka and Richmond companies at the time I presented the amendment to the committee, and had never dreamed of it. He was very careful not to let me know the secret intrigues of his department with spies and blackmailers. I presented it on account of the arrest of those Italians, and the fear in my State that these prosecutions were to become general, and on account of the large appropriations of nearly $300,000 in the sundry civil bill which could be used for such unworthy purposes. I desired to avert these calamities from my State and from the Territories that had been raided before under the Schurz administration, in consequence of which a law had been passed to protect them; which law fairly construed would cover this very case.

It is construed, I believe, now in the Department that it only refers to timber that grows on the mine itself. If that be so, the law has no meaning whatever, because very seldom timber grows on mines. If there should be any timber on the mine, it would belong to the miner, because he had the title to the mine and a right to cut the timber without the law, and consequently the act would have no meaning whatever unless timber in the mining regions off of the mines may be cut. This law was passed after deliberate discussion. It has been considered for more than ten years as a warrant for cutting this timber. I say it has no meaning whatever if Mr. Stockslager's construction was right. I introduced the amendment to prevent this very thing that was going on, and now he says I did it to protect railroad and other corporations. That is a very easy thing to say, and a very wicked thing to say when he knew that the amendment I offered could have no such operation; that it only prevented malicious prosecutions of persons in the mining regions for cutting fire-wood which was unfit for all commercial purposes, to be used for only mining and domestic purposes.

Every man who has built a fire in Nevada under his ruling is liable to be arrested, and because he has commenced proceedings against these corporations is there any virtue in that? His first proceeding was against these Italians, and they were taken about 200 miles from home, poor men, without having committed any offense. They were acquitted by the court and had to pay their own expenses. That was the moving case. Now he says that I am doing this to protect corporations. I will say of him that he is deceived, that the information he has got is false, that the law is against him. Whatever these people have done they had a right to do, and I want to know the information and I ask for it here. Has he any special discretion to keep such information?

If the cutting of timber is a public thing does he think the people of Nevada are going to leave that State to avoid a criminal prosecution, because it applies to all of them? There is no timber, properly speaking, that comes within the prohibition in the State of Nevada, which is east of the Sierra Nevada Mountains. There is a small portion of Nevada that extends up the east side of the Sierra Nevada Mountains. There the timber has been sold, the land sold, and the timber cut off. The timber used about Virginia City comes from California, from the heavily-timbered Sierra. But when you get 30 miles east from the western line of Nevada there is no timber. There never was a saw-mill in that region; there never was a saw-mill within 100 miles of Eureka; I do not think within 200 miles, unless there is one in Utah within that distance, where the timber is heavier. What scrub and sage-brush there is about Eureka nobody ever regarded as timber, and the people have cut it freely.

The Commissioner complains of these people for taking up the stumps. People do not dig the stumps where wood is plenty. The wood that they get in those mountains would never be used if there were no mining there. For 30 miles around Eureka there never would have been a farm opened or an attempt made to cultivate the land if it had not been for the market the mines afforded. The timber that is cut grows above in higher altitudes than farms can be cultivated. The timber line is on an average about 6,000 feet above the level of the sea in that region. It grows in the crags of the mountains, and any man who has seen it will agree with me that if the miners will go and develop the country and use this scrubby wood they ought to be left alone.

They not only use scrub wood but they take sage-brush. There have been thousands of acres of sage-brush cleared in that country for fuel and roots pulled up for mining and domestic purposes. A visit to Tuscarora, the other mining camp where Mr. Price's companies are, will show that nine-tenths of all the fuel they have used has been sage-brush. They have taken it for miles and miles around. These are the extremities to which these people are driven, and they have cut some of this scrubby wood and Mr. Price offered to pay for what had been taken simply to avoid the trouble of a prosecution. I went with his counsel to an officer of the Government, supposing I had a right to go there and represent my constituents. He goes into the New York Herald and attacks me for doing so. Has it come to this, that officers of the United States will attack gentlemen for doing their duty in the Senate? Does anybody want a practice of that kind inaugurated? If Mr. Stockslager had called upon me when he got this report from Eureka, I could have given him important information. He had no right to assume that I would do wrong. He had no right to telegraph to California that I was doing wrong. If you get to the bottom of this transaction you will find that it is a conspiracy of some men who want to blackmail the Richmond company and the Eureka company, and want to be employed as lawyers or as spies to make somebody disgorge, as they say. And that is the scheme, and this agent has fallen into it or he is the victim of it.

Mr. Stockslager says that he has reputable witnesses; that he has citizens of the United States, reputable men and officers of the Government, who have given him this information. I say that if any man has found cause for bringing suits in that region he has made a discovery that the people ought to know. If any man has found a reason for commencing a system of prosecution against all the people in my State and the people in all the Territories, let us know it, for if anybody has made the discovery that the Government has been robbed out of ten millions, I want to know by what process he does so, and the people of my State want to know it. Can it be for the interests of public justice that a man who has made such a discovery shall not be known? There is no danger of a lack of people in my State to prosecute. The timber will not be replaced. The roots are dug up.

I tell you this is a scheme to waste the public money to blackmail citizens of my State. It is a corrupt, outrageous scheme, and the information the Commissioner has acted upon is false, and he ought to be lawyer enough to know that this law covers the case, that the people had a right to cut this scrub timber. But to ask for three or four hundred thousand dollars to prosecute these people and have it granted to a man with no more discretion or sense than that, and whose conduct in this transaction shows that he is not fit to be trusted with the use of any money, is preposterous. He shows no discretion at all. Think of a man who does not know better than to prosecute all the people of Nevada! And if he acted impartially he would prosecute all the people of Arizona, Montana, and Idaho. He must have the people of this whole region prosecuted when they have violated no law, and when there is an express statute authorizing them to do just what they have done.

Why the necessity of this haste to prosecute them now? He says if there is any delay great injustice will be done; that the Government will lose those ten millions of money. It has gone on now for almost ten years—yes, for thirty years, because before the passage of this law it was held that the right to mine carried with it the necessary incident of cutting this timber without which men could not mine at all. That I say was the construction before this law. He ought to have the fate of Schurz before him. No harm has come to the country. It is true the miners have cut wood, but there was very little of it, and none has been wasted at all. It has all been used even to the roots, and I say that any appropriation whatever for this is wrong, and Congress ought not to sanction it for a moment.

One thing more. I offered some evidence the other day of the views of a gentleman who is as able to judge as any member of this Senate or the other House, and who is well known in the Capitol. He represented Nevada during two terms of Congress, and was till recently a bank commissioner under this Administration. He is now a candidate for Congress, and is the editor of the Eureka Sentinel. He is one of the most prominent Democrats in our State, and a very popular man there, too. Here is what he said about this transaction. He has not heard of this last newspaper raid, but he has heard of the scheme to blackmail the citizens of Nevada. He says:

NOT MUCH IN IT.

[Eureka Sentinel, August 18.]

The story telegraphed from Washington that the Richmond and Eureka Consolidated Mining Companies are to be sued for $10,000,000 for cutting Government timber is nonsensical in the extreme. There is no ground for any such suit. If anybody at Washington imagines there is any Democratic politics in this sort of thing they are to be pitied for their stupidity. We incline to believe that the Department has been misled from this end of the line. The agent who came here (another importation from Iowa) knew nothing about the condition of Government timber nor anything else in Nevada. He seems not even to have had a decent conception of the provisions of the law under which he was supposed to be acting. The cutting of timber for mining and domestic purposes is especially permitted by the statute in the mining regions.

The cutting of timber and the conversion of it into charcoal with which to smelt the minerals out of the ores is as much a use for "mining purposes," within the spirit of the act, as is the appropriation by the miner of sticks to cook his pork and beans a use for "domestic purposes." One is as much a violation of the law as the other, both being especially allowable under the law. This has always been the doctrine held by everybody in the mines for twenty-five years, and it is ridiculous to place any other construction on the law. Nothing will come of the proposed suits. No jury in the State could be found who would not kick these cases higher than a kite in three minutes. No sane man believes that there has been any violation of the true spirit of the law. It looks a little like the Iowa agent may have been inspired in his report of this enormous trespass by some one who hoped to gain by harassing these companies with litigation. We would not give the Government 10 cents for its ten million suit.

When the people of Nevada see this enormous pronunciamiento from the Commissioner of the General Land Office and these publications in the New York Herald and the consternation which this thing produced in the other House—of course I do not blame members of Congress for getting excited over a thing of this kind, following the Commissioner of the General Land Office, for the presumption is that he is correct—they will be astonished. I tell you there is no politics in it. If any political party undertakes to carry out these prosecutions, I do not think it dare run a candidate in the State. No political party is responsible for it, and all are agreed that there ought to be no politics in it.

I agree with Mr. Cassidy that Mr. Stockslager is very much mistaken. If anybody attempts to force these prosecutions our people will resist the manifest wrong, as any people naturally would and ought to, as it is manly for them to do. No sensible, decent man would think of doing this thing, and Mr. Stockslager, if he had taken the trouble to consult me and get the information, or my colleague here, or my colleague in the other House, or the honorable Senator from California [Mr. HEARST], who knows all about this, five minutes' talk with him would have settled the whole question. He knows all about it, and can explain it to the Senate better than I can, because he is thoroughly practical in his ideas about these things, and knows just exactly what miners have done for the last forty-five years.

I say that the information was at hand, and instead of being imposed upon by a man who was sent out and stuffed by somebody who wants to levy blackmail, if he had consulted any of the representatives of that country or the Delegates from the Territories, they could have told him that there was no politics in this; the people would rebel against anybody who would attempt to prosecute them in that way, no matter whether Republicans or Democrats. They would be all the same on this question as on the Chinese question. They are the same on this question that they were from the beginning when they first commenced to struggle to have their rights acknowledged that they had acquired when they developed that country and made homes and developed the mines under rules and regulations made by themselves.

They were very tenacious that their rights should not be taken from them by forced sales at auction. They presented a solid front on that issue without regard to politics. After Congress granted that relief, and again when Mr. Schurz undertook to trample on their rights and prosecute them they presented the same solid front. Nobody asked whether he was Republican or Democrat. He was only asked whether he was willing that these people should be treated decently and whether he was in favor of stopping their cutting fire-wood in the dead of winter and arresting men when they were not violating the law, but building up homes and developing that far off country. They all felt the same about it.

When the law of 1878 was passed the men who were instrumental in getting it through became the idols of the people; and now in the face of the law and against justice this man, without giving any person from the Pacific coast whom the people trust an opportunity to explain, goes into the newspapers and attempts to arraign a Senator who has treated him civilly from the beginning, who never did him wrong or said a word in disparagement of him, for our relations were pleasant, and why should he attempt this raid? Now for Congresss to give him $350,000 in his discretion to punish these people would be an outrage that ought not to be tolerated in any civilized country, and I do not think it will be in either House of Congress when the facts are known.

Mr. BECK. Does the Senator desire a vote on this resolution now?

Mr. STEWART. I should like to have it acted on now.

Mr. BECK. I stated a short time ago that a communication had been sent by the Commissioner of the General Land Office stating that the effect of this resolution, if it were passed as presented, would be to prevent the United States from any possibility of succeeding in pending suits. Mr. BURNES has it. I sent for it, but he tells me he left it at home and I can not get it this morning.

Mr. STEWART. There is a copy of it in the RECORD.

Mr. BECK. Oh, no. The letter I refer to is bearing on this question, not on the other.

Mr. STEWART. Another letter?

Mr. BECK. Does the Senator desire a vote on the resolution to-day without that communication? If he does I have no objection, but I think it would be better for the resolution to go over until to-morrow.

Mr. HEARST. I think the Senator from Nevada had better consent to the resolution going over.

Mr. STEWART. I want the information laid before the committee in time for action.

Mr. BECK. Very well, let the matter go on, then. I can say in a few words what I desire to say.

Mr. STEWART. I have no objection to its going over if the committee will delay action until the information comes in.

Mr. BECK. That does not bear on this at all. I do not care anything about the resolution going over now. I will state in a moment what I have to say.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PALMER in the chair). The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS].

Mr. BECK. Let the amendment be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 3, after the word "communications," it is proposed to insert:

Except such as in his opinion ought to be withheld for the purposes of justice.

Mr. BECK. I ask the Secretary to read what the Commissioner said he was doing in his letter to Mr. BURNES, that part of it, and then I will make a short statement.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

The proposed legislation is purely in the interests of large and wealthy mining corporations, foreign as well as native, and also in the interest of railroad corporations who have in many portions of the country monopolized the cord-wood cutting and charcoal industries.

I am warranted in stating that it originated in the desire to prevent the prosecution of anticipated suits which have since been ordered upon the recommendation of this office against the Richmond Mining Company and the Eureka Consolidated Mining Company, owning mines in Nevada, for the recovery of $9,917,461, the total value of wood and charcoal derived from timber cut by and for these companies upon the public lands, aggregating 1,305,964 cords of wood, from a portion of which were derived 28,704,662 bushels of charcoal.

These two companies alone have literally laid bare the hills, mountain ranges, and cañons within a radius of 35 miles from Eureka, not sparing the undergrowth, but taking everything from 3 inches and upwards, not simply "dwarfed and scrubby timber," but mahogany, cedar, and pine trees. Even the stumps of the trees have been removed.

These depredations are rendered the more aggravating by the fact that the Richmond Mining Company is exclusively a foreign and British corporation, organized in London, England, having for its manager an alien who is a British nobleman connected with the Duke of Northumberland. Its stock is owned in London, where its dividends, amounting to many millions within the last seventeen years, are declared. The only citizen shareholders are among the employés of the company, to whom a few shares have been assigned to give the organization a show of legality. Thus do the profits of our American public domain go to enrich the already wealthy lords, noblemen, and gentry of foreign lands at the expense of our own citizens, actual settlers and their children, for whose benefit the public lands should be saved in all their richness of soil and wealth of timber, agricultural, and mineral products.

The Eureka Consolidated Mining Company is a corporation resident in California and reaps all the benefits of the timber in Nevada.

What these two companies have done is being done by other mining companies in Nevada and their attendant charcoal burners and smelters, who have been for the past ten years or more, and yet continue, felling the timber upon the public lands, sweeping clean large tracts of every vestige of timber, "small and scrubby" though it be.

Complaints against this class have frequently been sent to this office by the honest bona fide settlers, among them appeals from the most respectable and worthy citizens of that State; and upon these complaints and appeals for the aid of this office towards suppressing such complete havoc of their supply of timber, which, though small and inferior, is all they have to depend upon for fuel and other domestic needs, and its frugal use is therefore rendered all the more essential, I directed a special agent to look carefully into the matter and report thereon. What he found and reported has, in substance, been above stated and fully justifies all the complaints which have been made, and is also corroborated by facts personally communicated to me by a reliable gentleman of high character and standing in Nevada, who reports that these depredations and others of like character are being daily perpetrated.

Mr. BECK. All I have to add is, that these suits have been brought solely against those two great corporations, and information is now in the hands of the Commissioner that he thinks warrants him in saying that he will recover. The Senator from Nevada himself has said that a compromise was offered by the attorneys for some of these corporations, which was declined, of 50 cents a cord, and, according to the number of cords they used, that amounts to $620,000 and odd.

Now, when the United States has brought suit against these corporations, it is proposed that the Commissioner shall be required, at the request of the Senator from Nevada, and the Senate shall make itself a party to the transaction, to furnish all the affidavits, all the statements, all the papers, and develop all the facts on which he has proceeded, which can have no other effect—I will not say object—than to let the defendants understand what the case of the United States is, and enable them to run off all the witnesses, as Mr. Stockslager says they can, and break down the United States in the suits.

If the Senate is going to lend itself to any such purpose I shall be very much surprised.

All we ask is that we may have all the information, and these foreign corporations may have all the information, the disclosure of which is not inconsistent with justice or the public interests, but that the Senate will not bring private papers here upon which suits are brought, to develop them to the defendants, so that they may beat the United States—that is the proposition which is now made—and to allow the Commissioner to retain such papers as he thinks will destroy the case of the United States if made public——

Mr. STEWART. I should like to ask the Senator a question——

Mr. BECK. The amendment of the Senator from Vermont obviates the difficulty, and I will call for the yeas and nays on the adoption of that amendment.

Mr. STEWART. Before the Senator takes his seat I wish to ask him a question. If this matter was to be kept secret why did the Commissioner telegraph to San Francisco from here telling what had been done and how much timber had been cut? Why did he publish it in the New York Herald, and why does he continue to publish it? I undertake to say he has no such information.

Mr. BECK. All I know is that it was of sufficient importance for the Senator from Nevada to introduce lawyers of some of those corporations, who went and offered to pay 50 cents a cord as a compromise, as the Senator said awhile ago. When that compromise was declined, and an investigation was made and the suits are pending, is it right that the Senate of the United States should be used as a medium to break down the United States in such a case, and to develop the facts upon which the Government relies? Surely such a course never was pursued before and was never asked before in any court or offered in the Senate, as far as I am advised. It can have no effect whatever, except to aid two great foreign corporations who are charged by the United States as wrong-doers in avoiding punishment by getting rid of the witnesses on whom the Commissioner relies, as he says in the communication sent to me as a member of the committee of conference, and given to Mr. BURNES.

Mr. HEARST. Will the Senator from Kentucky allow me a word?

Mr. BECK. Certainly.

Mr. HEARST. The Senator speaks of these as foreign corporations. There is no foreign corporation there as I understand.

Mr. BECK. There is one. The Richmond Mining Company is a foreign corporation and the Eureka Company is foreign to Nevada.

Mr. STEWART. There is no Eureka corporation in Nevada.

Mr. BECK. The Richmond corporation is foreign to the United States.

Mr. STEWART. No, it is a corporation in Nevada.

Mr. BECK. The whole question is, has the United States a right to present its case without the Senate of the United States being called upon to make it develop its case in the interest of the defendants? Such a thing never was done, never ought to be done, and never was asked before, and I am amazed that the Senator from Nevada or any one else should ask that the United States should be required to break its own case down and enable these corporations to run off the witnesses and destroy any chance we have to recover, through the action of the Senate claiming that the Senate wants to look at the papers! The papers will do the Senate no good. The Senate ought not to make itself a party to this case in the interest of these corporations against the United States; and the amendment of the Senator from Vermont is so obviously correct that I shall be astonished if the Senate votes it down, and therefore I call for the yeas and nays upon it.

Mr. STEWART. I withdraw any objection to the amendment of the Senator from Vermont, and let the Commissioner conceal the names of these persons if he wants to.

Mr. BECK. Conceal them from the defendants.

Mr. STEWART. If there is anything secret about them, why did the Commissioner publish what he has in San Francisco, why did he go into the New York Herald and publish all the details, and why has he given it publicity, if it were a matter so secret as that?

Does he think all the people in my State are going to run out of it? I say that he has no reliable information as he says he has. I undertake to say if he has it is not worth a cent, because the people under the law had the right to cut the timber; and I say it is a matter of buncombe, going into the newspapers and publishing the matter, and then desiring to keep it secret for public purposes. He can use everything, put it in the newspapers, assail Senators, tell falsehoods about them, draw false inferences about them, charging them with what they have never heard of or thought of, and he says he does it on responsible and reliable evidence. He can publish that all over the world and then say "The evidence I have got is secret; these people convict Mr. STEWART; respectable citizens convict him; they convict him of trying to impose upon the Senate; but their names and what they say is a secret!"

Why did he publish the other, then? Why did he go into the newspapers and make a blackguard of himself and attack a Senator? Are there no privileges here? When a Senator is doing his duty, is it the right of a departmental subordinate to circulate slanders about him in the newspapers, and then when we call for the information on which these slanders are based the Commissioner says the people of Nevada will run away; there is danger to public justice; and a ten million dollar suit is involved for taking away the scrub timber around Eureka. The whole proposition is too absurd. Everybody knows the Government does not expect ever to get a cent. Everybody knows, who knows anything about this transaction, that it is simply a scheme of blackmail, and that the Commissioner has lent himself to an unworthy and an outrageous scheme which will reflect dishonor on the Government and on him. All the people of my State know it, Republicans and Democrats alike.

I will accept the amendment of the Senator from Vermont and let the resolution pass, and see what answer it will bring.

Mr. BECK. I thought the Senator would accept the amendment. I doubt whether he could get a vote against it but his own.

I desire to say, what the RECORD will show, that when the Senator speaks of the Commissioner of the General Land Office as making himself a blackguard and attacking him, the Commissioner states in the most courteous language that he disavows any such intention and never used the Senator's name except in referring to his amendment, for there is not a word that reflects on the Senator, and the position taken by the Commissioner from beginning to end is solely that of a man endeavoring to do his duty by bringing suits and endeavoring to withhold information from the defendants in the case which would destroy the case of the United States. There is not one word beyond that.

The interview in the Herald does not disclose anything that consists of an attack on the Senator. The Commissioner is acting as a good business man and a good officer would, and I have no reason to believe that the Senator is actuated by any other motive than to prevent what he thinks are persecutions, but the effect of his resolution to have the information called for without the amendment of the Senator from Vermont would be to destroy any chance the United States has to recover, and to give the corporations thus sued an opportunity to run off every witness and to break down the case of the United States in advance.

I do not say one word as to the merits of the matter, and have never said a word concerning them.

Mr. JONES, of Nevada. I should like to ask the Senator from Kentucky, when this work has been going on for twenty years in the presence of the people of the State of Nevada, does he believe there is any secret about it? Does he believe there is any fact about it that is secret?

Mr. BECK. I only say that the defendants have no right to this information.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PALMER in the chair). The question is on the resolution of the Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART].

Mr. BECK. There is no objection to the resolution now as it is amended.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kentucky withdraw his call for the yeas and nays?

Mr. BECK. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the Senator from Vermont being accepted by the Senator from Nevada, the question is on the resolution as amended.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask the Senator from Nevada to modify the resolution so as to make it a call on the Secretary of the Interior instead of the head of a bureau. We do not usually call upon subordinates.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is right.

Mr. STEWART. I will do that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution as modified will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, directed to furnish the Senate without delay with copies of all reports, affidavits, and communications upon which he based—

Mr. EDMUNDS. That should read "upon which the Commissioner of the General Land Office based his statements"—

Mr. STEWART. That is right.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be so modified. The reading will be continued.

The CHIEF CLERK.

Upon which the Commissioner of the General Land office based his statements in his letter to Hon. JAMES N. BURNES, of the House of Representatives, dated August 18, 1888, with regard to the following amendment to the sundry civil appropriation bill:

"That no part of the money appropriated by this act shall be used in the investigation of any case or the prosecution of any person in the mining region of the United States for cutting, for mining or domestic purposes, dwarfed or scrubby timber, unfit to be sawed or hewed into lumber of commercial value."

Mr. JONES, of Nevada. I wish to occupy the attention of the Senate for only a moment.

The cutting of the timber referred to by my colleague [Mr. STEWART] has been perfectly open and public for twenty-five years. The idea that there is any "secret information" which the Commissioner of the General Land Office has about it is therefore a surprise to me, as it will be a surprise to the people of Nevada. The region in which it has been cut is one that, if it were not for these mines, would never be penetrated by civilization. In any definition of the word "timber" this is not timber at all; it is scrubby stuff (called by the special agent "mahogany" and manzanita), which, when it gets dry and before it it is cut, splits all up, so that it is absolutely worthless for any commercial purpose whatever. The people of that country believe that under the law passed in 1878 they have a perfect right to cut this scrubby, gnarled stuff. According to the report here, they had to cover an area of 40 miles to get sufficient of it for the purposes of these two mines.

Mr. HEARST. Let me ask the Senator whether it is not the fact there is not a saw-mill within a hundred miles of there, and no timber that would make any sort of lumber?

Mr. JONES, of Nevada. It is true, as the Senator from California suggests, that there is not a saw-mill within a hundred miles, and there never was a stick of timber—what people here understand to be timber—within a hundred miles of the place that is the origin of these suits. While I do not question the integrity of Mr. Stockslager I can only say as to any special secret agents who would recommend the bringing of such suits, that they would have to be either grossly ignorant of the facts or actuated by sinister motives not far removed from blackmail.

Mr. BECK. I understand the suit is pending in the United States courts.

Mr. JONES, of Nevada. Why, sir, it is very easy to institute suits at any time and have them pending in the United States courts. The Government of the United States, with unlimited means and unlimited power, does not feel the hardship of going from remote parts of a State to the capital, but the people do feel it. For citizens to be driven from pillar to post and obliged to defend themselves at large expense, is a great hardship. No more baseless suit was ever brought.

The business of both the companies complained of is conducted in the most honorable manner and by most honorable men. Nine-tenths of the product of their mines is paid out in labor. The companies have dealt fairly with the Government and with all the world. The cost to them of every bushel of charcoal used at the time of which complaint is made was much more than the cost of the same quantity to people in more favored sections of the country, even where the timber lands had to be purchased of the Government.

The men who cut that "timber," Mr. President, were pioneers of our civilization; they were building up the country; they had to contend with all the rude forces of nature. It was impossible for them to think of using such coke as, in the absence of railroads, would have cost them $50, $60, or $70 a ton; yet it was entirely out of the question to have worked those mines without the use of coke or charcoal.

The parties charged with the offense in this case have a perfectly good defense; there will be no difficulty on that score. The United States can get no judgment against them. But the men are not rich, and they will feel the oppression keenly—all the more keenly from the consciousness of having violated no law. It will cost them a large sum of money to employ counsel and defray the other expenses necessary to be incurred in a suit brought against them by a great government with an overflowing treasury.

These men have helped very materially to build up the region to which they belong, and instead of being subjected to prosecution, they should receive encouragement from the Government. Had the Commissioner of the General Land Office inquired of those who have had every opportunity to know the facts—men who represent that State and adjoining States in this Chamber—he would have found that there was no foundation for any suit whatever. Those suits are outrages upon the companies referred to; they are outrages upon the people of Nevada. Why, sir, there is scarcely a man in my State against whom a similar suit could not be brought, and, of course, to his great injury and wrong.

Everybody at all acquainted with the country in which those mines are situated knows that not a stick of that timber would ever have been put to any use were it not for the mines in that vicinity. Without those mines that country would never have been opened.

The Commissioner of the General Land Office speaks about a "second growth" of that timber. Why, Mr. President, the growth that was cut down started, I suspect, at the dawn of creation and would not have produced a "second growth" before the crack of doom.

It is absolutely necessary that a law be passed to defend the people of that region in their rights, and to protect them from expensive and harassing litigation.

The system of employing secret agents to carry on the business of this Government in its dealings with its citizens is all wrong and should call forth the condemnation of Democrats and Republicans alike.

I hope the time will never come when the law-abiding people of the United States will have cause to fear the methods of inquiry adopted by their Government. I trust the system of "secret police," so odious wherever employed, is never to be incorporated into the legal and governmental machinery of this Republic.

The people of our Western States and Territories could more easily defend themselves against the treacherous ambuscades of hostile savages than against the sinister machinations of secret agents of the Government, lying in ambush in the very heart of their own communities. The Government owes a higher duty than that to its citizens, especially to those who, at infinite cost of sacrifice and patient toil, have built up the waste places of the Republic.

For my part, Mr. President, I hold that in cutting that wood the pioneers were but blazing the trail of western empire, and in burning it were lighting the fires of civilization on the mountains of the Pacific.

I trust the resolution offered by my colleague will be adopted, and that the motive for these prosecutions will be made plain.

Mr. ALLISON. I should like to have a little further information upon this subject. As I understand the statement of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, sent to the desk to be read by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK], this timber is said to have been cut by great railway corporations and by other great companies for charcoal purposes, carrying and conveying the idea that these parties are engaged in denuding this whole region of timber for the purposes of traffic and sale, and not for the purposes, as suggested now by the Senator from Nevada, of carrying on the necessary operations of mining in that high altitude. Inasmuch as an amendment in the sundry civil bill is the subject of this controversy and is pending before a conference committee, I should be glad to have some details given that will enlighten us, because on the face of the amendment it simply seems to require that people shall have the authority to go upon the public lands and cut certain timber for domestic purposes and necessary local purposes.

If, instead of that, this amendment is to be enlarged and construed as suggested by the Commissioner of the General Land Office, then, as a matter of course, the Senate should never agree to it, because no great corporation, whether it had its origin in London or in San Francisco, or in Nevada even, should be permitted to go in there and sweep away great regions of timber. Therefore I should be glad to have this subject ventilated a little further so that we may know exactly what there is at the bottom of it.

Mr. BECK. This resolution will bring it out so far as the Secretary of the Interior can give us the information, and I should like to see information furnished.

Mr. VEST. I do not know anything about the facts of this resolution or this debate. I supposed it was a sort of controversy between the Commissioner of the General Land Office and the Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART], and had not paid any particular attention to it. But a remark made by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] causes me to make one suggestion.

It has been my custom for several years, as I intended to do this summer, to visit the Western Territories, and especially the Territory of Montana, where a large number of my people are living, and where I feel as much at home as in my own State of Missouri, and where there is, permit me to say, the finest summer climate in the world, without any sort of exception. Being devoted to a large extent to field sports, especially to fishing, it has been my custom to travel over that Territory, and I have seen personally—and I do not speak from any documentary evidence—cañon after cañon utterly devastated and destroyed by these companies, one of them called the Montana Improvement Company, that has made certain specific arrangements with the Northern Pacific Railway Company, and then proceeded to move improved portable saw-mills up or down the railroad, as you please, speaking both directly from east to west, and left in their wake nothing but the stumps of trees, without actually a single tree standing.

Mr. STEWART. The amendment I offered does not reach that. It applies only to such timber as could not be moved or sawed into logs.

Mr. VEST. I am simply replying to the suggestion of the Senator from Iowa. This abuse went on until the Commissioner of the General Land Office who preceded Mr. Stockslager came into office, a gentleman that I suppose succeeded in making more enemies to the square inch, as they say in the Western country, than any public man in this country. He attacked this enormous abuse in Montana. I believe him to be an absolutely honest man. As a friend of mine once said to a lady of his acquaintance, he was an absolutely honest and good man, but he had more winning ways to make people dislike him than any man I have ever seen in a public position, unfortunately.

He attacked this abuse among others, and issued an order that this improvement company should be prosecuted in the United States courts, and called upon the law department of the Government to institute the prosecution, and at the same time that no more timber should be cut upon the public lands. Immediately liberty lay bleeding in the forests, not in the streets, and the Commissioner of the General Land Office himself was attacked all over the Territory because he had prohibited the people from going upon the public lands in order to cut timber for their own use in the mines and for domestic purposes.

Now I come to the point of what little I propose to say. The Senator from Iowa says the people ought to be permitted to go upon these public lands to cut such timber as they need. That is true. It is impossible in a great many Territories for them to enter the land, the only way in which they can get timber for mining purposes—the land is not surveyed, as the Senator from California [Mr. HEARST] behind me suggests—and they are compelled to have timber to build houses, and as firewood in winter, and for mining purposes, and they must obtain it off the public land; but the difficulty is in defining what timber shall be used for these purposes in order to keep out those speculators who have denuded all the cañons along the Northern Pacific Railroad in the eastern part of the Territory of Montana. The difficulty is in that single point.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair must inform the Senator from Missouri that the hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, it becomes the duty of the Chair to lay before the Senate the unfinished business, being the bill (S. 12) to provide for the formation and admission into the Union of the State of Washington, and for other purposes.

Mr. CULLOM. I hope the regular order will be laid aside to allow the Senator from Missouri to conclude his remarks.

Mr. VEST. I have very little to say, not so much as to even ask for the extension of half a minute.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There being no objection, the Senator from Missouri will proceed.

Mr. VEST. I simply wanted to emphasize this point, that the difficulty of this whole question comes in when you attempted to give to the people of the Territories what they should have, the right to cut timber for their own use, and at the same time to keep out these speculating companies who have enriched themselves without any regard for the interests of the people and have put money into their own pockets and abused the orders of the Commissioner of the General Land Office and the laws of Congress in their own interest and to the detriment of the public.

It is very true that the Secretary of the Interior modified the order that was made by General Sparks, but it excited widespread indignation.

Mr. STEWART. I should like to call the attention of the Senator to the amendment so that he can talk directly to the point. This is not the case he is talking about. The amendment provides:

That no part of the money appropriated by this act shall be used in the investigation of any case or the prosecution of any person in the mining region of the United States for cutting, for mining or domestic purposes, dwarfed or scrubby timber unfit to be sawed or hewed into lumber of commercial value.

Not used for railroads, but for mining and domestic purposes. Then the House this year have passed a very carefully prepared bill, and I was guided, although I did not have it before me at the time, by my recollection of the language they had used with reference to reservations for mining. They had a proviso in the bill that passed the House. This is the House provision of this session:

Provided, That it shall be lawful for the residents of either of the States of Colorado or Nevada, or either of the Territories of New Mexico, Arizona, Utah, Wyoming, Dakota, Idaho, and Montana, to cut and remove timber on the public domain under existing law and the regulations thereunder for the period of six months after the passage of this act.

Mr. BECK. Is that in the bill now?

Mr. STEWART. That is in the bill as it passed the House, and I will call the Senator's attention to what they describe as timber. The description of timber would not make it unlawful to cut that kind of timber, any way. It has no reference to scrub timber, that can only be used for mining and domestic purposes.

Mr. VEST. As to that, I agree heartily with what the Senator from Nevada has said in regard to it. There ought to be no order, no law of Congress that prohibits people from using timber that is fit only for firewood, and there should be no order or law which interferes with the people in using such wood as is necessary for their purposes in building houses, and in mining, and for firewood; but the line ought to be drawn between that sort of use of timber upon the public domain and the speculative purposes which have obtained in some Territories, and personally, within my knowledge, in the Territory of Montana.

Lumber was cut up there, not used in the Territory but sent outside, and enormous dividends were declared by these companies because of the facilities for transportation they had by reason of their connection with the Northern Pacific Railway Company; and from the fact that they were not molested by the public servants at all they succeeded in carrying out vast quantities of lumber and selling it in other places.

Mr. TELLER. I rise to suggest to the Senator from Missouri, who has just addressed the Senate, that in behalf of the Committee on Public Lands this morning I reported a bill to meet the very case that he suggests, and I ask the attention of the Senate to it for I desire to call it up at a very early day. The senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL] and myself have given it a good deal of attention, and while it is not satisfactory perhaps to either of us and perhaps will not be satisfactory to the Senate, it was the best we could evolve.

Mr. VEST. Will the Senator state its general features?

Mr. TELLER. Its general feature is that, under some regulation to be made by the Secretary of the Interior, licenses may be granted to cut timber on the public lands. We had in view the very suggestion made by the Senator that the people should be allowed to cut for their own use what timber they wanted. Then we had also in view the fact that there are regions of country where the land can not be bought, where the timber can not be brought into private ownership under any circumstances, and where people must live; and even where they can make title to their farms, having no timber on their land, the timber being in the mountains, there is no method by which they can get a title to the timber. To save all questions of this kind, we have attempted to evolve out of a good many suggestions that we had from various sources and in various bills a measure that we think will partially at least meet the case. If not, we can amend it from time to time. I only call the attention of the Senate to it so that Senators may look at it.

Mr. BECK. I am glad the Senator has reported such a bill. I have seen men living on the great plains, where they had no timber, and there is no timber except in the mountains, which are almost inaccessible and never can be located, of course, by homestead or preemption, and some man would put up a little sawmill at the mouth of a cañon and the farmers would haul their logs to him—that is allowed I suppose under the bill; but every man can not erect a sawmill. There should be some place, however, where they can be allowed to have the timber that they cut from the mountains to use for their houses and fences and other things of that kind without being punished for it.

Mr. TELLER. I will say that we have put a provision in the bill that every settler may get permission upon the payment of a dollar, which is simply to pay the fee of the land office, to cut timber on certain lands to be designated for his own use; and I reported the bill this morning. Then, in addition to that, if a man desires to cut wood to furnish a town, for instance, he may take 40 acres, paying one dollar and a quarter for the land, and haul the timber into town and sell it.

I have lived for twenty-seven years in a community where there was no possibility of making title to timber. I saw many years ago a prosecution of the very poorest men in the community for cutting timber on the public lands, and when they were brought in the judge said to the prosecuting attorney: "How can you prosecute these men? With what grace can I sit here and try these men for cutting timber when I know that for the school-house in this town, the church in the town, the court-house in which I sit, the timber has been cut off the public land? And can I punish these men for this, although it may be within the strict technical rules of the law?" Those men were almost all of them men who had come out of the great war ruined in property, who left largely the State of Missouri and came to our community, and were poor and trying to make a living, and yet the Government had several hundred of them arrested.

In 1882 it was discovered in the Interior Department that one prosecuting attorney had five hundred affidavits made on which he intended to arrest five hundred different people in one of the mining Territories—a mere matter of fees. He knew and everybody knew that the community would be driven out if they could not cut timber. He knew that a community that was producing a large amount of bullion would be a desert so far as human habitation was concerned if they could not cut the timber. There is the inducement, the temptation for a public officer to make fees at the expense of the people. The then Secretary gave the law a construction that it has not borne in all time, either before or since, and there was no further trouble. This trouble has arisen recently by a return to what I think is an erroneous construction of the statute of 1878.

I hope I may be able to call up in a day or two—and I propose to ask its consideration at the first opportunity after it is printed—the bill to which I have alluded, and I trust Senators will look at it, so that suggestions may be made if there is any error in it, as there may be, and that we may speedily pass the bill and send it to the other House, where it may yet pass and become a law, and relieve not only the people, but relieve the Department, because I do not believe the Department seeks to disturb the business or the interests of the people. The Department officers believe it is a duty put upon them by statute, and therefore they are trying to enforce what they think is the law, and they send out these agents, and the door is open for the grossest frauds in the world, and they will be perpetrated by these agents under any administration that ever has existed and they will be under any that may ever come hereafter. It is impossible to select a large number of men some of whom at some time will not go to work and do the most outrageous things.

Mr. BECK. I hope the Senator from Colorado will bring up his bill within the next three or four days and that we shall act upon it.

Mr. TELLER. I will bring it up as soon as it is printed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the adoption of the resolution of the Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART] as modified.

The resolution as modified was agreed to.

DISTRICT TAX SALES.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a concurrent resolution requesting the President of the United States to return to the House the bill (H. R. 10060) prescribing the times for sales and for notice of sales of property in the District of Columbia for overdue taxes; in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested.

Mr. HARRIS. I ask the consent of the Senate that the resolution just received from the House of Representatives may be laid before the Senate. It is important that it go to the President before 3 o'clock to-day.

Mr. EDMUNDS, I ask the Senator to explain what is the matter about this business.

Mr. HARRIS. In a House bill which has gone to the President there is a mistake in a date. The House has sent this concurrent resolution asking the President to return the bill in order that the correct date may be incorporated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, the resolution will be now considered.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, August 27, 1888.

Resolved by the House (the Senate concurring), That the President of the United States be requested to return to the House the bill (H. R. 10060) prescribing the time for sales and for notice of sales of property in the District of Columbia for overdue taxes.

The resolution was considered and concurred in.

AMENDMENT TO A BILL.

Mr. JONES, of Nevada, submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the fortification appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

TOLLS ON GOODS EXPORTED TO CANADA.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I submit an amendment intended to be proposed by me to the resolution offered by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR], further calling on the President for certain information, and ask that it may be placed with the resolution when it comes up to-morrow for the action of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be received and printed.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had, on August 27, 1888, approved and signed the following acts and joint resolution:

An act (S. 2116) to provide aid to State or Territorial homes for the support of disabled soldiers and sailors of the United States;

An act (S. 2833) granting a pension to Caspar Blanke, of Portland, Oregon;

An act (S. 2106) granting a pension to William Kelsey;

An act (S. 2118) granting a pension to Richard H. Van Dorin;

An act (S. 2500) granting a pension to Gertrude K. Lyford;

An act (S. 1162) granting a pension to Susan E. Alger;

An act (S. 2724) for the relief of H. H. Helper;

An act (S. 3219) to increase the pension of Keyes P. Cool;

An act (S. 509) authorizing an increase of pensions in cases of deafness;

An act (S. 94) for the relief of Perez Dickinson, surviving partner of the late firm of Cowan & Dickinson; and Joint resolution (S. R. 62) in recognition of the services of Joseph Francis.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. 5349) for the relief of James Trabue, Thornton Thatcher, Michael Callahan, and the widow of John Waters; and

A bill (H. R. 5888) for the relief of W. H. Boyd.

JACKSON, MISS., MUNICIPAL ELECTION.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. In pursuance of the notice which I gave on Friday last, I now move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Calendar number 1922½, being the resolution reported from the Committee on the Judiciary in respect to the municipal election at Jackson, Miss.

Mr. PLATT. I suggest to the Senator that he vary his motion so that the unfinished business may be informally laid aside.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I have no objection to that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. What is the suggestion of the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. PLATT. That the unfinished business be informally laid aside.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, the unfinished business will be informally laid aside.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Now I ask for the consideration of the resolutions.

There being no objection, the Senate resumed consideration of the resolutions reported by Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, from the Committee on the Judiciary, July 23, 1888, in regard to the recent Jackson, Miss., municipal election.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Mr. President, the Constitution of the United States declares that—

This Constitution, and the laws of the United States which shall be made in pursuance thereof, and all treaties made, or which shall be made, under the authority of the United States shall be the supreme law of the land; and the judges in every State shall be bound thereby, anything in the constitution of any State to the contrary notwithstanding.

This is an unqualified affirmation of the supremacy of the Constitution. It was deemed essential to the scheme of government formulated in the Constitution. It is so self-evident that this Republic can not long survive a departure from this central idea of the Constitution that it behooves all who may be intrusted with participation in our public affairs to resist all tendencies in that direction. And it is a neglect of duty to postpone this resistance until a wrong tendency shall have acquired such strength as to endanger the public good and the general welfare. The evils and disasters which come to nations have their origin in such neglect of duty in almost every instance. Our experience as a nation bears witness to the correctness of this statement.

It is not sufficient to assure the stability of this Republic and the permanency of its institutions that the Constitution affirms its supremacy within the sphere of its application. It does this in the definite language which I have quoted. But does this dispose of the fact as completely as the doctrine is definitely stated? If the question be confined to the theory of government involved it does dispose of it. No theory can be more directly and concisely stated than the one that appears in the Constitution's own affirmation of its supreme character. The framers of the Constitution and the States which approved it meant that this should be more than mere theory, for in the same article from which I have quoted, it is expressly declared that—

The Senators and Representatives before mentioned, and the members of the several State Legislatures, and all executive and judicial officers, both of the United States and of the several States, shall be bound by oath or affirmation to support this Constitution.

This oath or affirmation as completely embraces the provision of the Constitution that declares its supremacy as it does any other within the text of the instrument. It covers the entire field of the Constitution and of the laws made in pursuance thereof, and it is as much the duty of the legislative officer to make all laws necessary to give full effect to the Constitution as it is of the citizen to obey the laws when they shall have been made.

Our Government is a constitutional republic. Its Constitution is written. It does not exist in prescription, custom, or tradition. It may not be changed except by the concurrence of the nation and the States, nor even by them without due deliberation. In many important respects it has been amended. Fifteen articles have been added to it in this way. Three of these articles are the results of necessities disclosed by the progress of the rebellion that was organized in the interests of human slavery to effect the overthrow of the Republic. These amendments abolished slavery, defined citizenship, and assured to the citizen the right to vote.

The first of these, known as the thirteenth amendment, reads as follows, namely:

SECTION 1. Neither slavery nor involuntary servitude, except as a punishment for crime whereof the party shall have been duly convicted, shall exist within the United States, or any place subject to their jurisdiction.

SEC. 2. Congress shall have power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation.

So much of the fourteenth amendment as relates to the definition of citizenship and its definite protection reads as follows, namely:

SECTION 1. All persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States and of the State wherein they reside. No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws.

* * * * * * *

SEC. 5. The Congress shall have power to enforce, by appropriate legislation, the provisions of this article.

The scheme of an assured equality of citizenship was not yet complete and the fifteenth amendment was proposed to the States and adopted by them, and reads as follows, namely:

SECTION 1. The right of citizens of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or any State on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude.

SEC. 2. The Congress shall have power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation.

These several amendments became parts of the Constitution, in the order stated, on the following dates, namely, December 18, 1865; July 21, 1868; March 30, 1870.

It will be observed that specific care was had, in the preparation and adoption of these amendments, that their due enforcement never should be obstructed by disputations concerning the power of Congress to legislate in the premises. Much contention had taken place all along the line of the nation's progress in respect of the power of Congress to legislate on subjects not embraced in express delegations or incontrovertible implications of power. It was resolved that there should be no repetitions of these disputations so far as the three great subjects embraced in the amendments I have quoted might be concerned. Hence the express delegation of power to Congress to enforce said amendments by appropriate legislation.

Freedom, citizenship, and the right to vote, each for itself, possesses, by the most definite delegation of power to Congress, the right to demand protection against all assaults, and whenever Congress shall fail to make proper and effective response to this demand it will be recreant to the most solemn duty imposed on it by the Constitution, and however much political parties may have differed in respect of the wisdom of the policy and purpose which placed those amendments in the Constitution, the fact remains that they are present parts of that instrument to be respected and enforced. They are as supreme as any other provision of our national charter. They are above and beyond the field of the contentions of political parties. When the States ratified them the obligation of obedience at once attached itself to every citizen.

Mr. President, it is a matter of history that the Democratic party of the United States opposed the adoption of those amendments. In Congress, in State Legislatures, in its conventions, in its press, by every means in its power that party resisted their adoption. But in spite of all such opposition the will of the people and of the States prevailed, and freedom, citizenship, and the right to vote were no longer subject to the limitations of race, color, or previous condition of servitude. All that these great rights imply was embraced in the express and unqualified text of the Constitution, and no Senator or Representative in Congress, or member of a State Legislature, or executive or judicial officer of the United States or of a State can enter upon the occupancy of his office until he shall first have taken an oath or affirmation to support the Constitution in which these amendments are embedded and as supremely parts as any other of its provisions.

But here we are presented with a Democratic example of history repeating itself. That party opposed the adoption of the amendments; and now that they are parts of the Constitution it objects to their enforcement. But it is entitled to the credit of having served official notice that it would do so whenever and wherever it might have opportunity so to do. It did this boldly and officially. It gave the country full and explicit warning that when power might come to it it would disregard the amendments I have quoted and exclude the colored citizens from participation in political affairs. This is not my mere assertion. It is a historical fact, supported by official evidence, as I will now proceed to demonstrate.

The Forty-second Congress appointed a joint select committee "to inquire into the condition of affairs in the late insurrectionary States, so far as regards the execution of the laws, and the safety of the lives and property of the citizens of the United States." The committee made an exhaustive examination of the subjects committed to it. The result was a report from the majority of the committee composed of the Republican members thereof, and one from the Democratic members dissenting from the conclusions of the majority. These reports were made in the House of Representatives on February 19, 1872.

The minority report was signed by Frank P. Blair, T. F. Bayard, JAMES B. BECK, P. Van Trump, A. M. Waddell, J. C. Robinson, and J. M. Houks, Democratic members of the committee. This report is very lengthy, and gives very definite expression of the Democratic views of the subjects and rights embraced in the amendments of the Constitution to which I have directed the attention of the Senate. And as an official declaration of Democratic purpose in respect of the obligations imposed on the United States, the several States, and all officers and citizens by said amendments, I present a passage from the said minority report. In commenting on the conditions existing in South Carolina, the views of the minority are expressed in these words, namely:

As we have just remarked, we do not propose to discuss at large the question of negro government in these pages, but we feel that it would be a dereliction of duty on our part if, after what we have witnessed in South Carolina, we did not admonish the American people that the present condition of things in the South can not last. It was an oft-quoted political apothegm, long prior to the war, that no government could exist "half slave and half free." The paraphrase of that proposition is equally true, that no government can long exist "half black and half white." If the Republican party, or its all-powerful leaders in the North, can not see this, if they are so absorbed in the idea of this newly-discovered political divinity in the negro that they can not comprehend its social repugnance or its political dangers, or knowing it have the wanton, wicked, and criminal purpose of disregarding its consequences, whether in the present or in the future, and the great mass of American white citizens should still be so mad as to sustain them in their heedless career of forcing negro supremacy over white men, why, then "farewell, a long farewell" to constitutional liberty on this continent and the glorious form of government bequeathed to us by our fathers.

The mind of every thinking man is troubled about our future. He knows that a conflict of races must be the inevitable result of such a policy. In a struggle for the political power of the State this conflict is already as clearly marked as white is from black. The line of separation between parties there to-day is not only one of color and distinctive races, naked and unbroken, but it is a question of supremacy, of exclusive tenure to office, of the right to govern, and a separation of representation from taxation. Such an anomalous state of affairs as one race ruling another has never existed in any form of government, republican or monarchical, except by force and coercion. There can be neither sympathy nor harmony in any polity where such antagonism is attempted to be overcome by law. God's law is higher than man's law. Man's puny statutes can not repeal or nullify the immutable ordinances of the Almighty. Those whom God has separated let no man join together. There can be no partition of power, nor any peaceable joint exercise of power among such discordant bodies of men. One or the other must have all or none.

It is the very acme of folly and fanaticism to suppose, in this day of enlightenment and its consequent pride of feeling among the superior race, that there can be a reproduction of the ancient fable of tying the living and the dead together without causing the death of both. Who would have dreamed fifteen years ago, what highest and most far-seeing intellect among the great men who established this Government upon the basis of homogeneity of race and color, could have imagined that in the first century of its existence African freedmen, of the lowest type of ignorance and brutality, would rule a sovereign State of the Union and be the arbiters of the rights and property of a race who have ruled the destinies of nations ever since government was known among men? Such a state of things may last as long as the party shall last which had the power and audacity to inaugurate it, and no longer. But when that party shall go down, as go down it will at some time not long in the future, that will be the end of the political power of the negro among white men on this continent.

Mr. President, it does not require the aid of a forced construction to trace in the lines of this official Democratic declaration of doctrine and purpose a denial of every right guarantied to the colored citizens of the United States by the terms of the three amendments to the Constitution that I have presented to the attention of the Senate. Those amendments were all in force when this official utterance was placed upon the records of the nation and given to the world. They were as supreme then as were any other articles or sections of the Constitution. But the official report from which I have quoted denied their supreme character, and it appealed to God and His higher law in justification of the denial. It did all that I have stated, and did it not by implication, but in express terms. And that we may gather their full force and realize how emphatic they are, I here separate a few sentences from the body of the quotation I have made, but preserve their consecutive connection with each other. They are as follows, namely:

God's law is higher than man's law. Man's puny statutes can not repeal or nullify the immutable ordinances of the Almighty. Those whom God has separated let no man join together. There can be no permanent partition of power among such discordant bodies of men. One or the other must have all or none.

What does this mean? It does not seem to be in accord with that soulful proclamation of the Declaration of Independence which said to the world:

We hold these truths to be self-evident, that all men are created equal, that they are endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable rights, that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuits of happiness; that to secure these rights governments are instituted among men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed.

This is the doctrine on which our Republic and its institutions were founded, and it is the doctrine of the constitutional amendments. Let it be observed by all of our people, and the color line in our politics will be obliterated. This would assure peace and contentment throughout all the borders of all of the States. It would lead to an era of good feeling between the races which would put an end to the barbarities that have so long been practiced in some of the Southern States. It would do more to upbuild the industries and develop the resources of those States than can be done by color-line, race-hating politicians in centuries of time by following the lines of political action on which they now move. Such results would delight the people of the Northern States. They have not been nursing hate towards the people of the South.

They have been mourning over the follies that have prevailed in that section. They would rejoice, as no people ever have rejoiced, if that good feeling which alone comes from an observance of justice in the affairs of governments and the relations of men could replace the wretched conditions that obtain in some sections of the South. Nor would this spring from mere motives of selfish desire. No such miserable forces as these nerved them to the sacrifices which they made in their determined struggle to subdue armed rebellion, preserve the Union, and perpetuate our free institutions. They fought to effect the purpose so tersely declared by the founders of our Government in the preamble of the Constitution, wherein it is written:

We, the people of the United States, in order to form a more perfect Union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquillity, provide for the common defense, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity, do ordain and establish this Constitution for the United States of America.

For these purposes, the purposes of the Constitution, they fought, and it was to make these more secure that the amendments were placed in the charter of the Republic. They won the fight and saved the life of the nation. They had been sorely tried, but they endured all and triumphed. And when they returned to their homes from the fields of triumph where their victories had been won, not for themselves alone, but for the nation, they carried no hate in their hearts, nor is it in their hearts now. But they had memories, and these they took back to those homes, and there they abide to-day. The facts, the incidents, the sacrifices, the transactions, the mediate and immediate results of that great struggle went with them from those fields to those homes and have been living recollections through all the years that have passed since peace supplanted war. They remember how they and the nation took high resolve that what had been saved in that unsurpassed conflict of arms should not again be endangered, and how this resolution was written in the Constitution in the text of the amendments.

They wanted no repetitions of the great trials and sore experiences of the years they had devoted to the conquering of armed rebellion. They wanted no grounds left on which disputations could ever again plant themselves in contentions in respect of the status of the colored citizens of the Republic. They remember that for this reason the Constitution was amended, and that this great work was not the offspring of hate, but the child of justice, and with these recollections active in their minds they are determened that justice shall not be dethroned in this Republic. They make no new exactions. They seek not to impose duties and obligations on others that they are not willing to assume and discharge themselves. Obedience to the Constitution and the laws is what they practice and demand in respect of all of the momentous questions involved in the strife that evolved the amendments to which I have directed the attention of the Senate, and when they are told, by such official utterances as I have quoted, that, in respect of the equality of rights guarantied by said amendments—

Such a state of things may last so long as the party shall last which had the power and audacity to inaugurate it and no longer. But whenever that party shall go down, as go down it will at some time not long in the future, that will be the end of the political power of the negro among white men on this continent.

Their reply is ready in the language of the Constitution, which says:

This Constitution and the laws of the United States which shall be made in pursuance thereof, and all treaties made or which shall be made under the authority of the United States, shall be the supreme law of the land, and the judges in every State shall be bound thereby, anything in the constitution or laws of any State to the contrary notwithstanding.

Mr. President, this answer is conclusive, but it is not new. It is one of the original provisions of the Constitution. Without it the Constitution would have been an unreliable contrivance with which to conduct the affairs and enforce the powers of this nation. It stood by the side of the Democratic members of the joint select committee of Congress when they placed on the records of the nation the minority report from which I have quoted. With it and them stood the entire Constitution, including the amendments to which I have referred. It was in that presence that it was written in said report in respect of the colored citizens of this Republic that—

There can be no permanent partition of power, nor any peaceable joint exercise of power, among such discordant bodies of men; one or the other must have all or none.

Did the authors of that declaration expect to induce the people of this country to strike from the Constitution the grand amendments which they had but just ingrafted on it, guarantying equal rights? No such expectation was then expressed, nor would any political party dare to go to the country on a definite proposition to repeal those amendments now. What, then, was the office of that report? Its declarations were positive. Its propositions were explicit. Its argument was direct. Its invocation of the higher law was definite. This latter element must have seemed like an obtruder to those formulators of Democratic faith, in view of their then but recent denunciations of it when suggested by one not of their political creed. But it is there in company with the other remarkable things grouped together in that report. Taken altogether it is a strange chapter in our recent political history. But it must have had some purpose underlying it.

As we look back over the years that have come and gone since 1872, when that report was written, we can read in the events that have transpired in some of the Southern States its true character, and when tried by this test it seems to be resolved into a kind of chart of political action. The unlawful, not to say barbarous, practices to which the colored voters in certain States and sections of the South have been subjected seem to have moved quite closely along the lines indicated on that chart. The movements have all tended in one direction. They all converge to the common point of exclusive possession of all political power, and at which there will be—

An end of the political power of the negro among white men on this continent.

It is not my purpose to enter upon a review of the points that have been disclosed in the several investigations that have been had in respect of the unlawful means resorted to in various parts of the South for the suppression of the votes of colored citizens. The testimony taken by the several Congressional committees charged with the duty of making such investigations, and the reports which they have submitted to their respective Houses, disclose a condition of affairs shocking in all of its aspects, violative of the common humanities, and a reproach to a country that boasts of the superior character of its free institutions. In the records presented all manner of crimes appear, from personal intimidations to murders most foul. I take no pleasure in treating of these most shameful events. I most heartily wish that none of them had ever happened; and I devoutly hope that there may never be repetitions of them.

But I greatly fear that like occurrences will again transpire unless the law-abiding people of this nation shall set themselves so resolutely against them that no political party will dare to practice them or give to their perpetrators the slightest degree of recognition or avail itself of any of the results. These crimes against the American ballot are horrible in their every aspect, and deserve unqualified execration wherever, however, and by whomsoever practiced. If there is any one thing which above others in a republican government should have absolute security in its lawful exercise it is the right to vote and to have it counted as cast. A non-observance of this rule will very soon subject any government to the control of the worst elements of its population. When this end is reached all the evils of corrupt government follow as matters of course, and this rule applies to all elections, whether they be national, State, county, city, town, or village.

The only safety in such cases lies in resolute action on the part of those citizens who desire to enjoy the security which good government only can give, to reassert the sacred character of the ballot by driving from power all who fail to give it the absolute protection to which it is entitled. An enforcement of this rule by means of consistent practice would change the political complexion of the national administration of this Republic at the next November election; for it abundantly appears in the facts which have been gathered in the cases that have been investigated by committees of Congress, that with a free ballot and a fair count the solid South would disappear.

Indeed, but for the crimes committed against the American ballot the present Administration could not have been elected in 1884, and on that account, even though no other cause were present in the political conditions of this year, the American people owe it to themselves, to their institutions, and to even-handed justice, to defeat the present Administration at the election in November next. But when there is added to the Democratic assault on the American ballot the Administration's own definite assault on American industries, it may be predicted with confidence that the people of this country will, at the near approaching national election, decree a replacement at the head of the affairs of the Republic of the Republican party, which has always been true to both.

Mr. President, the American people can not afford to misjudge the true character of the political conditions with which they have now to deal. The contentions about protection and free trade do not embrace the only political issues to be resolved or in some degree affected by the result of the election to occur next November. The economic issues now so dominant in the public mind do not stand alone in the field of our national politics. Alongside of them stand other questions no less important. The issue presented by the extract I have read from the report made to the Forty-second Congress is present in the contest. It can not be disposed of by declaring that it is a thing of the past and should be left there. Let us not forget history. The spirit of that report asserted itself in the Democratic national platform of 1868, and declared that the reconstruction measures of Congress were "unconstitutional, revolutionary, and void." Let it be remembered that on the 11th day of July, 1870, the following resolution was brought to a vote in the House of Representatives, namely:

Resolved, That the fourteenth and fifteenth articles of amendment to the Constitution of the United States, having been duly ratified by the Legislatures of three-fourths of the several States, are valid to all intents and purposes as part of the Constitution of the United States, and as such binding and obligatory on the Executive, the Congress, the judiciary, the several States and Territories, and all citizens of the United States.

Let it be remembered that the Democratic party as represented in the House of Representatives planted itself in opposition to the passage of this resolution, and that within two years thereafter the report from which I have quoted was made to Congress by the Democratic members of the committee. This action on the House resolution is in harmony with the platform of 1868, and the two together may have been, and doubtless was, the inspiration inducing the making of that report. Let it be remembered that on the 5th day of February, 1879, the Democratic party was brought to another test on the question of the validity of the amendments to the Constitution. On that day a yea-and-nay vote was had in this body on the adoption of the following resolution, namely:

Resolved, as the judgment of the Senate, That the thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth amendments to the Constitution of the United States have been legally ratified, and are as valid and of the same paramount authority as any other part of the Constitution; that the people of each State have a common interest in the enforcement of the whole Constitution in every State in the Union, and that it is alike the right and duty of Congress to enforce said amendments, and to protect every citizen in the exercise of all the rights thereby secured by laws of the general character already passed for, and by further appropriate legislation, so far as such enforcement and protection are not secured by existing laws; and that it is the duty of the executive department of the Government faithfully and with diligence to carry all such laws into impartial execution, and of Congress to appropriate all moneys needful to that end.

The vote on the adoption of this resolution was yeas 23, nays 17; all of the votes cast for the adoption of the resolution were given by Republican Senators; all of the negative votes were cast by Democratic Senators.

A second resolution was immediately put to a vote, and it was in language as follows, namely:

Resolved, further, That it is the duty of Congress to provide by law for the full and impartial protection of all citizens of the United States, legally qualified, in the right to vote for Representatives in Congress, and to this end the Committee on the Judiciary be, and it hereby is, instructed to prepare and report as soon as may be, a bill for the protection of such rights and the punishment of infractions thereof.

The vote on this resolution was the same as on the others—23 yeas, all Republicans; 17 nays, all Democrats.

This record is in perfect harmony with the action of the Democratic party in respect of the amendments referred to from the time they were severally introduced into Congress until finally ratified by three-fourths of the States, as required by the Constitution. That party opposed in both Houses of Congress the submission of the amendments to the States, and it opposed their ratification in the Legislatures of the several States. The amendments are parts of the Constitution in spite of the determined opposition of the Democratic party, and the record it has made in respect of them shows that it is now as much opposed to their enforcement as it was to their adoption by Congress and ratification by the States. These are facts which the people of this country can not afford to ignore. They are as much a part of the present Presidential contest as are any other facts and issues that will be considered during the current political canvass and be passed on at the polls in November next.

The Democratic party is not loyal to the Constitution as the States have made it. This fact can not be excluded from the political contentions of this year. The present national Administration does not hold its tenure of office by authority of a majority of the citizens of this Republic entitled to vote. It is a minority Administration. Had all of the legal voters of the several States who desired to vote in 1884 been permitted to exercise their constitutional right in that respect, and their votes had been legally counted, the present Administration would not be directing the affairs of this nation. It can not be continued into another term except by a repetition of the violations of the constitutional rights of citizens that were practiced in 1884. If continued at all it will be as the representative of the minority of the voters of the country. We claim to be a government in which the will of the majority rules. This is the theory of our system of government, but the practice is quite the opposite. Shall this continue? This question must be answered at the polls in November. It is one of the vital issues of the present national contest. Shall this work of excluding the colored voters of this country from all participation in political affairs and interests go on until we reach "the end of the political power of the negro among white men on this continent?" This is the end to which the Democratic party is working.

Mr. President, when on Thursday last I yielded the floor to the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] that he might make the motion to adjourn, I was discussing the action of the Democratic party in respect of the adoption and enforcement of the amendments of the Constitution. I had arrived at the point in my observations having relation to the results that may be imposed on our country and its institutions if the people shall fail to properly consider and correctly resolve the question I had been discussing. I remarked that it was one of the vital issues involved in the present political activities which will assemble the voters of this nation at the polls in November next, and I can but assert my belief that if the Democratic party shall win success at the polls in the election then to transpire it will do more in the future than it has in the past in respect of the non-enforcement of the constitutional amendments.

Its success at that election will, in all probability, put it in possession of majorities in both Houses of Congress. It will be in control of the executive department of the Government. It will, in all reasonable probability, in one way or another, obtain a majority of the members of the Supreme Court within the next four years. With these conditions established, what shall stay that overthrow of the amendments so much desired by the "solid South," which constitutes the dominant wing and force of the Democratic party? And here it is well to bear in mind that one of the Senators who cast one of the Democratic votes in this body against the resolutions I have quoted, pronouncing the validity of the thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth amendments of the Constitution, and declaring for their proper enforcement, is now a Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States. Let this be a warning to the people of this country against allowing the result of the approaching Presidential election to make probable the presence in that court of a majority of its members whose opinions in respect of said amendments shall concur with that held by the justice to whom I refer.

Mr. President, I do not suggest this warning because I believe that the Supreme Court may constitutionally assume jurisdiction of the political question presented by the contention relative to the validity of those amendments, for I do not so believe. But courts have done just what I suggest as one of the dangers involved in our present political contest. Some of them have assumed and exercised the political jurisdiction about which I am speaking. They have ignored the fact that under our system of government political questions committed to the political department of Government for action or solution when once by it determined excluded the intermeddling of the other departments. Such cases may repeat themselves.

The personal views of members of the courts as to what our system ought to be in this respect may successfully assert themselves in opposition to the adjustment made by the Constitution. Add to the force of personal views the pressure which the exigencies, real or supposed, of a political party may evolve, and a danger is at once present which is almost certain in cases involving political considerations to lead to jurisdictional usurpation. Often it happens that the personal conviction is surrendered to the established policy of the political party to which a judge or other public officer may belong. The Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN], in his remarks on the fisheries treaty delivered in this Chamber on the 14th instant, gave expression to a very noble sentiment in these words, namely:

> I believe, what I fear many do not believe, that this Government was born in a revolution that was organized in the world eighteen hundred and eighty-eight years ago, and I believe the King that gave to us our liberties Himself sacrificed to the children of men His imperial power when He was surrounded by legions of angels for the purpose of establishing His authority among men as He chose, in either His temporal authority or His spiritual authority. I believe that revolution is the foundation of the system that we are practicing in the United States, and that it was the first declaration that was ever made by supreme authority of the right of a human being to participate in his own government and of his responsibility to human as well as divine authority for his conduct in that particular. I believe that there is laid upon our shoulders in this country by divine command, not the divine right of kings to rule and the duty of obedience to the possessor of a strain of blood that may come down to us through certain veins or certain loins, but the divinity of manhood with which we should be clothed and which we have put in force and are to continue to act out through the most successful examples that have ever been set to mankind in all the annals of government.
> That divinity is the right of a human being to participate in his own government and his responsibility to God and to man also for his political conduct. I believe a sin against the Government of the United States, wilfully perpetrated by an American citizen who is conscious of the wrong at the time he does it, is a very high moral offense. I believe that the Constitution of the United States, as it is and as it will be after we have amended it better to conform to our future experience, places us under a moral obligation which is almost the coequal of any that could be mentioned in respect of any duty that is to reach away into the depths of an unknown futurity. I have that sort of reverence for this Government and for this Constitution which inspires me with the belief that when I serve, when I obey, and when I honor it, I am obedient at least to that extent to the divine authority that rules amongst nations and also amongst men.

If the doctrine here expressed were dutifully obeyed throughout all of the States where slavery once obtained, this country would be rid of the most troublesome questions and threatening contentions which now disturb its political conditions; but it is not treated with a decent respect in those States. The Senator from Alabama can find but few, if any, members of his party in those States to agree with him in respect of the divine right to which he referred, and in his declaration that—

> That divinity is the right of a human being to participate in his own government and his responsibility to God and to man also for his political conduct.

I have great personal regard for that Senator, and can but express my regret that he is a victim to the unrelenting pressure which his party brings to bear in opposition to the noble sentiment that he uttered; and the pressure is so great upon him that his case is an apt illustration of the statement I have made relative to the danger which will confront this country in the matter of the usurpation of political jurisdiction by the Supreme Court should success attend the Democratic party at the polls in November and put it in possession of the possibility of securing a majority of its partisans in that tribunal. With his clearly expressed conviction of the divine right of man to participate in his own government that Senator has demonstrated that he can not withstand the pressure of his party when it demands that he shall follow it rather than his own personal opinions; for on the 5th of February, 1879, he recorded his vote in opposition to the resolution of this body affirming the validity of the constitutional amendment which declares that no citizen shall be deprived of the right to vote because of race, color, or previous condition of servitude.

He went down under the force of party pressure; and if this could happen in his case, what may we not expect of a partisan judge concerning the same question, should it by any means whatsoever be presented to him for determination? The State which he in part represents in this body is earnestly enlisted in the manufacture and practical application of this partisan pressure. This appears in the elections held in that State. In 1886 the total number of votes cast in the eight districts of Alabama for candidates for Representatives in Congress was 86,654, being an average for each district of 10,831. The First district cast the smallest number of votes, 4,236 being the total. The Fourth district cast the greatest number, the total being 20,958. Now, let me compare this with the result in Iowa at the same election. Iowa has eleven Congressional districts. The total number of votes cast in these districts for Representatives in Congress at the election of 1884 was 337,431, making an average for each district of 33,742. The lowest number cast in an Iowa district was 26,277. This was in the Eleventh district, which embraces the most sparsely settled portion of the State. But it will be observed that the number of votes cast in this minimum district of Iowa is 22,041 greater than was returned for the First district of Alabama.

But, Mr. President, this is a better showing than some of the other States of the South present. If we turn to the case of the State of Georgia we find that at the Congressional election of 1884 there were cast in her ten districts for a corresponding number of Representatives in Congress a total of 27,580 votes, being an average of 2,758. The highest vote cast in any one of the ten Georgia districts was 6,680. The lowest total vote cast in any one of the eleven Iowa districts was, as I have already stated, 26,277, or 23,519 more than the highest number cast in any one of the Georgia districts.

The total number of votes cast in the seven Congressional districts of the State of Mississippi, at the election in 1886 for Representatives in Congress, was 45,354, making an average to each district of 6,436. The highest number of votes cast in any one of those seven districts was 12,117, or 14,160 less than were cast in the minimum Iowa district.

South Carolina has seven Representatives in Congress, and of course has a corresponding number of Congressional districts. At the election in 1886 there were cast in her seven districts a total of 39,072 votes for Representatives in Congress, or an average of about 5,585 to the district. The greatest number of votes cast in any one of these districts was 12,444, or 13,833 less than the lowest total of any Iowa district.

The four States of Alabama, Georgia, Mississippi, and South Carolina have thirty-two member of the House of Representatives. Now let us look at the results of the methods of the Democratic party in these four States from another standpoint, keeping in view that the officially declared purpose is to effect—

The end of the political power of the negro among white men on this continent.

The grand total of the votes cast at the Congressional election in 1886 in the thirty-two districts of the four States mentioned was 198,660, or 138,771 less than were cast in the eleven districts in the State of Iowa at the same election. The average number of votes cast for each of the thirty-two members of Congress in the four Southern Democratic States was about 6,189, while the average for each of the eleven members from the one Northern Republican State was 33,742. And right at this point let us remember that corresponding results are likely to occur at the national election next November, both in respect of the selection of members of the Fifty-first Congress and Presidential electors, except that in regard to the latter the number will be forty instead of thirty-two, owing to the fact that the number of Presidential electors to which these States are entitled equals the total representation of each in both Houses of Congress. Hence, if the vote cast in November next shall correspond with that stated for 1886, the average number which each Presidential elector in the four Democratic States will represent will be about 4,966 against 33,742 in the Republican State of Iowa, and the result in all of the other Northern States will be practically the same.

Mr. President, are not these facts and figures worthy of serious consideration by the American people? If the conditions of political affairs which they represent are to continue, what will become of that equality of the States in respect of which there has been from time to time so much fervid eloquence expended by Democratic orators in this country? Have they lost all regard for the equality of the States in the Union? Have they subordinated everything of this kind to the chances of party success? If so, it is quite time for the American people to take into serious account all of the facts and possibilities involved in the political canvass now in progress in this country. Not to do so will be criminal neglect of the highest duty of citizenship. If present practices and conditions are to continue, how long will it take to permanently establish the rule of the minority in this Republic? We have it now in the executive department of the Government and in the representation of the States in that branch of Congress whose majority is the result of the facts to which I have called attention.

If this is to continue through another four years of minority control, during which the membership of the Supreme Court may, by the course of nature or by legislation, be so changed as to place it on the side of this drift towards a revolution in our system of government, how will the nation ever recover its lost ground? A majority of the present members of this body will have no difficulty in recalling an incident that occured in this Chamber when, during the second session of the Forty-eighth Congress, one of the present justices of the Supreme Court, then a member with us here, declared with great vehemence:

No man shall in my presence call Jefferson Davis a traitor without my responding with a stern and emphatic denial.

Who can say that the sentiment of this utterance may not, at some time, be found incased in a decision of the tribunal of which its author is now a member if the present quiet but resolute revolution of our system of government shall go on until the minority shall be in full possession of all of its departments and the court shall bave usurped political jurisdiction?

The Constitution says that—

Treason against the United States shall consist in levying war against them, or in adhering to their enemies, giving them aid and comfort.

If Jefferson Davis did not place himself within this definition of treason, then no man ever did or ever can; and it is not pleasant to contemplate the fact that the time may come when a majority of the Supreme Court of the United States may hold to the view of one of its present members in respect of the crime of treason; and if the time shall ever come when a majority of that court may be of the opinion indicated, and its declaration can be of service in such an exigency as was forced on this nation in 1861, we may be now assured that it will be made. This is a possibility not more unlikely to transpire than was that other one which greeted the inauguration of President Lincoln with an actually existing state of war.

Mr. President, it will not dispose of the facts and suggestions I have presented to say that they are out of place and have no relation to the present political movements in this country. The results that have already come to this country through the unlawful practices and disregard of the constitutional rights of citizens to which I have directed attention, all bear witness to the truth of my diagnosis of our political case. Not a break in the line of movement towards that overthrow of the constitutional amendments which shall establish in their stead the Democratic doctrines officially pronounced in the extract I have, in the course of these remarks, read from the minority report of the joint select committee of the Forty-second Congress.

Amongst the more recent cases in which effort has been made to give effect to the doctrines of that report is that of the municipal election held in the city of Jackson, Miss., in January last. It was announced in the newspapers of the country, and was stated in communications of citizens that the votes of the colored citizens of Jackson had been suppressed by unlawful means, and that certain United States officers had participated in such suppression. The subject was brought to the attention of the Senate, and this body, by resolution passed on the 12th of January last, directed the Committee on the Judiciary to make investigation of the case. The committee discharged the duty imposed on it, and made report to the Senate. The report and all the testimony taken by the committee have been printed, and are at the command of all members of the Senate desiring to examine them. A majority of the committee had no difficulty in arriving at its conclusions, which were that there had been a total suppression of the votes of the colored voters of Jackson, and that the United States officers designated in the resolution directing the investigation had participated in the methods used in such suppression. A minority of the committee dissented and presented its views to the Senate in writing. This dissent has also been printed by order of the Senate.

Not only did the committee arrive at the conclusion which I have stated, but it became impressed with the belief that there has rarely been a case of interference with the right of voters to vote which had less justification than the one in question. It is doubtful if there is another city or town in Mississippi that can make as good a showing of desirable results of municipal government as were realized by the city of Jackson from January, 1874, when John McGill was first elected its mayor, down to January, 1888, when he was defeated at the election which has been investigated. During the fourteen consecutive years here indicated he exercised the powers and performed the duties pertaining to the office of mayor of the city of Jackson in a very efficient manner. The affirmative beneficial results of his administration of the affairs of the city are sufficient to explain his long continuance in office. He entered upon the administration of the city government in January, 1874. At that time the city was in bad financial condition in all respects. It was in debt to the amount of $50,000 on account of municipal expenditures. The credit of the city was at ruinous discount, its treasury warrants rating at about 30 per cent. below par. Its tax rate was 22½ mills on the dollar of valuation.

The streets were unlighted notwithstanding there were gas-works in the city. The streets were in bad condition, no grading had been done on them, and sidewalks were almost unknown in the city. In about every other respect the city was in bad condition. All of this was changed during the fourteen years of Mayor McGill's administration. The debt of the city was all paid off. The streets were lighted with gas, and several of them graded and graveled. Sidewalks appeared throughout the city. Needed bridges, other than the one over the Pearl River, were built. The city credit was restored to par, and the tax rate was reduced to 10 mills on the dollar of valuation. In every respect the city improved.

During these fourteen years the right of each voter in the city to cast his ballot was unobstructed. The colored and white voters were about equal in number. There was no division on the color line. So well satisfied was a pronounced majority of the voters of Jackson with the progress of the city and the conduct of its affairs that no serious opposition could be organized against the man who had been so efficient in the management of the interests of the city. For seven successive terms of two years each John McGill had been elected mayor. There was no race conflict between the white and colored voters of Jackson induced thereby. On the contrary, most amicable relations existed between the two races. This is clearly established by the testimony taken by the committee. No one will contend that this is not true. It is established by the sworn testimony of Republicans and Democrats who appeared before the committee.

The record made by the colored voters of Jackson during the fourteen years that John McGill was mayor of that city can stand unabashed in the presence of the most orderly community of white Democrats in the State of Mississippi. Indeed, so good was this record that the Democrats of Jackson despaired of ability to successfully attack it by the lawful methods of a peaceful election. But they watched and waited for opportunity to assert in the city of Jackson the officially disclosed Democratic doctrine that the colored race shall exercise no political power on this continent. It was a tedious process, and it was severely trying to the political patience of the Democrats of Jackson. The colored voters would be orderly citizens, would obey the law, would attend to their own affairs, would refrain from giving cause of offense to the impatient, hot-blooded Democrats of the city, would persevere in a consistent effort to demonstrate that they were worthy to possess the right to vote.

This was hard on the Democrats of Jackson. They could not afford to assault this right of the orderly, law-abiding, and peaceful colored citizens of Jackson without some pretext behind which to hide the real purpose. The testimony taken by the committee proves beyond doubt the excellent character and conduct of the great mass of the colored citizens of Jackson. Indeed, there is a significant agreement between the report of the committee and the views of the dissenting minority, submitted in writing to the Senate in this report.

The report of the committee states that—

Nothing appears in the record of the testimony taken by this committee tending to show that the colored citizens of Jackson were not as observant of law, as devoted to good order, as peacefully inclined, as circumspect in conduct as, were the white citizens.

This statement is not controverted by the minority of the committee. Indeed, it is emphasized by the views of the minority submitted to the Senate, and from which I make the following quotation, namely:

There had been, even away back into the era of slavery, the kindest feeling between the two races in Jackson (see Spellman's testimony). The mass of both races, as stated by Mayor McGill, were of the best and most orderly of all people. The whites, though about equal in numbers to the blacks, had for fourteen years acquiesced in a government based mainly on negro suffrage. Though there were discontent and complaints, yet there was no organized opposition. Mayor McGill was proceeding with certainty to his eighth term as mayor of the city with the acquiescence of the great body of whites and with the active support of many who were not Republicans.

This is not a plea of confession and avoidance by the minority. It is a confession of the truth of the entire case as presented in the report of the committee in respect of the administration of the municipal affairs of the city of Jackson during the fourteen years of the occupancy of the mayoralty of John McGill, and of the conservative, law-abiding, and peaceful character of the colored citizens of the city. No excuse could be found in these respects upon which to organize an opposition to the re-election of McGill to another term as mayor. He was, as the minority of the committee admits—

Proceeding with certainty to his eighth term as mayor of the city with the acquiescence of the great body of whites, and with the active support of many who were not Republicans.

It would be a very severe reflection on the character of the citizens of Jackson, both white and colored, for any one to say that this condition of acquiescence was the result of bad government and corrupt practices. That the facts are all the other way the testimony taken by the committee and reported to the Senate establishes, and even the minority of the committee admits in respect of McGill that—

It was known to be difficult to beat McGill. His financial administration had been reasonably satisfactory. He was clever and popular; had been to a great extent non-partisan in his administration.

It was not for objections to the character of the municipal government as conducted by McGill, nor yet to that of the mayor himself, that the Democrats of Jackson were waiting and watching. "He was clever and popular." His government could not be successfully assailed. Something far different from these features of the case must be found. The task seemed hopeless; even the colored citizens of Jackson would not give cause or excuse to the restless spirits of the local Democratic leaders to raise the race issue. These colored citizens would insist on so conducting themselves that even the minority of the committee felt itself compelled to concede that they were "of the best and most orderly of all people." This was a disheartening state of affairs for the Jackson Democrats, who wanted to redeem their city from Republican rule.

But an exemplification of that much quoted saying that "it is the unexpected that happens" came to their relief. Christmas eve of 1887 transpired. It brought the opportunity to draw the color line, and it came about in this way: A number of young white men of Jackson so deported themselves on that particular Christmas eve as to bring about a conflict between some of their own number and a colored man. The white men were the aggressors. The result was that a young white man named McWillie Mitchell and a colored man called Bob Whitesides were killed. Concerning this happening the report of the committee makes the following statement, namely:

The excitement which followed the unfortunate events of Christmas eve was seized upon and turned to political account. McWillie Mitchell had been killed by a colored man known as Bob Whitesides, and the latter was killed by a white man. It is not pretended that the colored citizens of Jackson were any more to blame for the killing of Mitchell than were the white citizens for the death of Whitesides. Very few members of either race were in any way involved in the unfortunate transaction, and none of either race, so far as the testimony shows, gave it approval. None of the actors in the merry-making of that Christmas eve anticipated the results that transpired. Mayor McGill, in his testimony before the committee, said:

"Christmas eve and Christmas day with us is the day above all others of good feeling and rejoicing, and, among some, carousing and a good deal of disorder, more so than any other day in the year. It is observed more than any other holiday. Everybody stops work and everybody has a good time that is able to have it. Everybody has the best time they can, and people who are in the habit of drinking, if they drink at all, will drink on Christmas or Christmas eve night. We always have more disorder on Christmas eve night than any other night in the year. I know from fourteen years' experience that I always dreaded Christmas eve night and Christmas day following (p. 105)."

From such conditions come the acts that led on to the killing of the two men. McWillie Mitchell was a young man greatly liked by his associates. His death caused great excitement amongst the young white men of Jackson. They at once took steps to organize the White League, as hereinbefore stated. Quickly followed the political movement of the Democrats of Jackson, which placed candidates for mayor and aldermen in the field, and the appointment of the committee of one hundred. The guiding actors in the movement seem to have concluded that the existing excitement could be intensified to such a degree as to afford the opportunity by a suppression of the colored vote of relieving themselves of what they denominated "a just reproach upon them for so long suffer ng a Republican administration in the capital city of a Democratic State."

In this affair the Democrats of Jackson saw their opportunity. The testimony taken by the committee shows how thoroughly it was worked. It was turned to partisan account. On Tuesday night, December 27, the Young Men's White League adopted a series of resolutions, amongst which was the following, namely:

Driven by no sudden passion or blind impulse, but actuated by a firm and deliberate sense of the duty we owe to ourselves and to our race, we hereby warn the negroes that if any one of their race attempts to run for office in the approaching municipal election he does so at his supremest peril; and we further warn any and all negroes of this city against attempting, at their utmost hazard, by vote or influence to foist on us again this black and damnable machine miscalled a government of our city.

This was a definite and emphatic declaration of the establishment of the color line, and it was adhered to and practiced on to the extent of the suppression of the colored men's vote in the city of Jackson. This is the rugged part that can not be put out of the way by the special pleading and specious argument contained in the views of the minority of the committee.

On the same night that the resolution I have quoted was adopted by the White League the Democrats of Jackson held a convention and presented their case in a preamble and resolutions, which were published in the newspaper organ of their movement, as follows, namely:

Democratic white line resolutions, adopted by the Democratic convention at Jackson, Tuesday night, December 27, 1887.

Mr. Chairman, your committee on resolutions ask to present the following:

Whereas the Democracy of this city, recognizing the just reproach upon them for so long suffering a Republican administration in the capital city of a Democratic State, and having determined to no longer submit thereto: Therefore

Be it resolved by the Democrats of the city of Jackson, in mass meeting assembled, That we to-night nominate candidates for mayor and aldermen, and hereby avow our purpose to elect them.

Resolved, That, in general terms, we assert that the present city government has been inefficient, unsatisfactory, and objectionable; and especially has its police department been inefficient in the protection of both life and property, and we refer to the occurrence of the past few days in proof thereof.

Resolved, That the chairman of this meeting appoint a committee of one hundred to see that the ticket is elected.

Resolved, That all citizens of Jackson, without regard to past political affiliations, are invited to co-operate in the election of the candidates nominated by this meeting.

R. E. WILSON,
SAM'L LIVINGSTON,
D. P. PORTER,
JOHN T. TAPLEY,
THOS. P. BARR,
FRANK JOHNSON,
L. BRAME,
Committee.

It will be observed that the editor of this Democratic organ understood that his party was moving on the white line just as was the White League. It will be further observed that the preamble and resolution were the deliberate work of a committee that had been appointed to perform that particular work, and in order to place its authenticity beyond all doubt the several members of the committee signed their names to the report, two of them, Wilson and Livingston, being two of the United States officers mentioned in the resolution of the Senate directing the investigation in this case to be made. In the preamble we find the reason stated for the movement in which the Democrats of Jackson were then embarked. What was that reason? I repeat it here just as that Democratic convention expressed it and published it to the world. It was as follows, namely:

Whereas the Democracy of this city, recognizing the just reproach upon them for so long suffering a Republican administration in the capital city of a Democratic State, and having determined no longer to submit thereto: Therefore,

Resolved, etc.

Such is the high, public, political, and moral ground on which the Democratic party of Jackson planted itself! There is no denial that was the reason given by the organized Democracy of that city for the movement in which it was engaged. There is no pretense that it did not state the exact truth of the matter. Nor can it be denied that the purpose avowed would have been a dismal failure had it not been for the result induced by the co-operation of the White League and the Committee of One Hundred, which was the suppression of the votes of the colored citizens of Jackson. Now, let the men who put forward that reason as a justification for their action stand by their own work; and if they do they will not extend a vote of thanks to the minority of the Committee on the Judiciary for its endeavor to formulate a different case for them from that which they deliberately made for themselves.

The work of the White League and the committee of one hundred produced the desired result. The colored voters had registered with intent to vote at the approaching municipal election. There were about as many colored voters in Jackson as there were of white voters. A considerable majority of the colored voters were Republicans. They did not sympathize with the reason given by the Democratic convention for its desire to rid the city of Jackson of its Republican administration. That the white voters did not all concur in that reason for political action is clearly shown by the result of the vote cast at the election. The whole number of votes cast, all being deposited by white men, was 392. Of these the Democratic candidate had 220 and John McGill 127. Had the colored men been allowed to vote McGill would have had a pronounced majority of the aggregate vote. The white line Democrats understood this from the start, and for that reason cooperated with the White League in a common endeavor to prevent the colored men from voting. A reign of terror was instituted and carried to such extent that the colored voters held a meeting on Wednesday evening, December 28, 1887, and adopted the following preamble and resolutions, namely:

Whereas the colored people have been reliably informed that the Democratic club or committee of Jackson have invited Democrats from various other places and adjoining counties to be here on election day for the purpose of preventing the colored voters from voting or participating in the city election next Monday, January 2, 1888: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That in the interest of peace and harmony and the protection of life and property, that the colored people refrain from voting or in any way participating in said election.

Resolved further, That the colored candidates for aldermen are hereby withdrawn.

Was this the voluntary action of men who for years had regularly registered and voted? Did they by some sudden change in their natures and inclinations conclude that after all the trouble they had subjected themselves to in respect of getting on the register of 1887, in order that they might vote at the near approaching election, it were better that colored men should not vote, and that all political power in the city of Jackson should be possessed by the white promoters of the movement to suppress the votes of colored citizens? The character of voluntary action here involved is like unto that which the highwayman induces the peaceable and unarmed traveller to practice when he places a revolver against his head and demands his money. Of course the money is surrendered; for the traveler would rather part with that than with his life. But who would think of calling that voluntary action? No more was the action of the colored voters of Jackson voluntary. This is attested by a very intelligent colored citizen of Jackson who testified before the committee and who said in respect of the action of the colored voters in the adoption of the resolution I have quoted:

If we had been assured at any time, however, that we could have voted without molestation, that we would have been protected in the right to vote, we would have voted; but we felt that there was no protection whatever, and the consequence was we felt that the safe course for us to pursue was to withdraw entirely. That meeting was attended by all the representative colored men, what are known as leading colored men, members representing various branches of industry there, societies, and so on.

But, Mr. President, no such assurances were given to the colored voters either before or after the meeting at which they passed the resolutions withdrawing their candidates, and avowing their purpose to abstain from voting. On the contrary, they had been informed that they would not be permitted to vote. This information was both direct and by deduction. That which came by the latter method was well defined by one of the colored men who gave testimony before the committee. From that part of his testimony in respect of the absence of the colored men from the polls I make the following quotation, namely:

Q. Did they vote at the last city election?
A. They did not.
Q. Why did they not vote?
A. Well, sir, on account of the reign of terror that existed at that time. They abstained from voting for fear that their lives would be sacrificed if they attempted it. That is the only reason.
Q. State, if you know, what caused them to believe that they would be interfered with if they should attempt to vote.
A. The utterances of the little squibs in the New Mississippian, and the expressions of the speakers at the capitol, and the invitation that the New Mississippian extended to voters to come there and carry the election. Now, people that don't live in Mississippi don't know so well how these things are, but when they say they are going to carry the election we know what that means; the colored people understand that. That is sufficient.
Q. What does it mean?
A. It means that they are bound to carry the election by fair means or foul. We know it; we don't want any more than just that. You don't need to shoot a man's head off to make him believe a thing.

Whoever will take the trouble to read the reports of other committees of the Senate on election outrages in Mississippi will readily comprehend the force of statements and deductions of this witness. The colored people of Mississippi have come to know by hard experience what such expressions, facts, and declarations as he refers to mean when applied to their race on the eve of an election. The correctness of this witness's deductions is verified by the deplorable and barbarous facts which crowd the pages of the reports to which I refer, and when we consider in connection with this deductive information that which came direct as to the purposes of the promoters of the white-line movement, we will not wonder at the extreme conservatism of the colored voters of Jackson. A part of this direct information consisted of a report of a declaration made by the secretary of the committee of one hundred, in one of the meetings held by that committee in respect of the methods to be used in preventing the colored citizens from voting. It appears in the testimony that while that meeting was in progress some one in attendance asked the secretary, Chiles, how he would prevent the colored men from voting, and his response was—

When they come up to the polls to vote take them by the nape of the neck and kick them away from the polls, and if they resent it, why then let the trouble commence.

Chiles was deputy sheriff, and it appears in the testimony that he returned to the sheriff's office on the adjournment of said meeting, and stated in respect of the proceedings had that—

We have resolved to carry the election, and we have appointed committees, or will appoint them, to attend each voting place in the city on election day, and if a single negro attempts to vote he will be pitched out of the window and his neck broke.

This method for disposing of the colored voters in case they should make effort to exercise their right to vote seems to have been well received by the members of the committee of one hundred, as will appear from the following quotation from the testimony given in this case by a witness who was present when Chiles made the declarations during the progress of the meeting referred to. The witness was examined in respect of the committee of one hundred, its purposes and proceedings, and the following questions and answers appear in his testimony, namely:

Q. What was the avowed purpose of that committee in respect of that election?
A. To elect the ticket that had been nominated by it.
Q. And by what methods?
A. They were going to carry the election.
Q. Was one of its avowed purposes that of preventing the colored voters of Jackson from voting?
A. I don't think a colored voter would have been permitted to vote.
Q. Why do you think so?
A. Because I think under the condition of affairs that existed then—the peculiar state of affairs that existed—the organization of the campaign was such that it would have just been impossible to permit the colored man to vote.
Q. Was Mr. William Henry, the then candidate for mayor, a member of that committee?
A. Yes, sir,
Q. Was he in full sympathy and accord with its movements?
A. I am under the impression that he was. He was always present. I never heard to the contrary.
Q. Do you know one Rev. J. B. Gambrell?
A. I do.
Q. Was he a member of that committee?
A. He was.
Q. Do you remember, in any meeting of the committee, of his asking how they were going to prevent the negroes from voting?
A. He did not ask the question in that way.
Q. How did he make the inquiry?
A. The question he asked was, how they were going to prevent the registered colored voters from voting.
Q. Who answered his inquiry?
A. Mr. L. F. Chiles.
Q. What did he say in answer to that?
A. He said, "Just take him by the nape of the neck and march him away from the polls," or something of that kind.
Q. Was L. F. Chiles a member of the committee of one hundred?
A. He was.
Q. Was there any opposition expressed to the method proposed by Mr. Chiles to prevent the negroes from voting?
A. Nothing was said one way or the other; he simply made that remark, and there was no discussion one way or the other about it; nothing more was said.

All of these facts, and many more of like character, were reported to the colored men of Jackson, and induced them, for their own safety and the peace of the community to refrain from voting, notwithstanding they had registered with intent to participate in the then approaching election just as they had been accustomed to do in a long series of preceding years.

Mr. President, did the colored voters misjudge the case that confronted them? Were they unduly alarmed? In giving answer to these questions let us keep in mind that the meeting of the colored voters at which they passed the resolution declaring their purpose to refrain from voting was held on Wednesday evening, December 28, 1887, and that on the next evening the Democrats held a convention and adopted the following resolutions, namely:

Resolved, That this convention having received the assurance that hereafter no negro aldermen or negro policemen will be a part of the city government, and that in the election to be held on Monday next none but white men will vote, negroes having voluntarily agreed to stay away from the polls: Therefore,

Be it resolved, The Democracy of the city of Jackson pledges that, so far as it can govern, the election shall be fairly and peaceably conducted.

It would be difficult to misunderstand or misconstrue the purport of these resolutions. The first resolution is a mere statement of the reason that induced the convention to adopt the second one. Because of the assurance received as stated in the first, the second was adopted. The word "therefore," which connects the two resolutions, is a potential force in determining just what the convention meant by their adoption. It shows as plainly as language can express an idea that if the colored voters had not resolved to stay away from the polls the Democratic convention would have given no pledge that the election should "be fairly and peaceably conducted," and the testimony taken by the committee abundantly shows that preparations had been made by those opposed to the re-election of John McGill as mayor to enforce their avowed purpose to have a "white man's election."

One colored voter concluded to tender his vote on the day of the election. He went to the polls to carry out his purpose. The result is shown by the following extract from the testimony of an eye-witness of the transaction:

On election day, at the poll where I voted myself, which was the only one that I attended during the day, there was a crowd there constantly all day of young men, men who did not live in that ward, men who had never been in the habit of taking an active part in that ward in our elections. The room was crowded with them all day long. Only one colored man presented himself to vote at that precinct. He was an old crippled man. When he went in a young man took him by the back of the neck and hustled him out in a hurry. He told him, "Damn it, this is a white man's election, and you have no business in here." That was the extent of the offer to vote on the part of the colored people, so far as I know.

This single instance gives force and point to the belief of the colored voters that the committee of one hundred and the White League had adopted the suggestion of L. F. Chiles in a meeting of the former body, of which he was a member, that if a colored man should offer to vote—

Just take him by the nape of the neck and march him away from the polls.

Mr. President, it is proper at this point of the discussion that I should notice a complaint made by the minority of the committee in its views of dissent from the report of the committee in respect of this man Chiles. That such a complaint should have been made is a matter of surprise to me, and it has no support in the true history of the case. The complaint is embraced in the following language, namely:

And here we may say that expressions by Mr. Chiles looking the other way are not shown to have been participated in by others, and it is but due to him and those attempted to be injured by his alleged statement that we should here state that Mr. Chiles was denied the privilege by the committee of confronting his accusers and explaining his own meaning and language.

What are the facts? On the 17th day of April, 1888, it was given in evidence before the committee that L. F. Chiles was secretary of the committee of one hundred, and that at one of the meetings:

He suggested the idea that the negroes be prohibited from voting. Some one asked him how he would prevent them. Mr. Chiles said, "When they come up to the polls to vote, take them by the nape of the neck and kick them away from the polls, and if they resent, why, then, let the trouble commence."

On the 20th of April the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE] presented to the subcommittee conducting the investigation a list of seven names of persons he desired to have subpœnaed as witnesses. One of the names presented was that of L. F. Chiles. A subpœna was issued for the entire list of witnesses, and a deputy Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate proceeded to Jackson to serve it. He had no difficulty in finding all of the persons whose names were in the subpœna except L. F. Chiles, who was a resident of Jackson, and deputy sheriff of the county in which that city is situated.

Two or three days were wasted by the officer of the Senate in efforts to find Chiles that he might serve him. He then communicated with me for instructions. I waited on the Senator from Mississippi to ascertain what might be his wishes in the premises, and explained the situation to him. The result was that he requested me to telegraph to the deputy Sergeant-at-Arms to erase the name of Chiles from the subpœna, and to substitute that of L. F. Montgomery. This was done, and nothing more was heard of any desire to have L. F. Chiles subpœnaed as a witness until after the testimony before the committee was closed; and then the suggestion that he be sent for did not come from him, but from one L. Brame, in a letter not addressed to the committee, but to the Senator from Mississippi, of date July 6, 1888. The truth of the matter is, as I believe, that the said L. F. Chiles had no desire to appear before the committee as a witness, and he certainly never made any request to be called. These are the facts in the case of L. F. Chiles, and yet the minority extend their complaint in respect of him in the following remarkable paragraph, which I quote from the views it presented to the Senate, namely:

The undersigned deem they have just reason to complain of this action of the subcommittee and of the whole committee. They impute no improper motives to either; but whatever may be the motive the result is that a witness of character, whose language has been misreported and who would explain it so as to make it entirely valueless as evidencing a design to interfere with the negro vote, has been without just ground therefor, refused an audience. Moreover, important record evidence, in possession of the witness, impeaching the assumed fairness of the financial administration of McGill has been suppressed. If this were a lawsuit between private parties concerning a matter of mere property right this action of the committee would, in the opinion of the undersigned, be reprehensible; but when we consider that this proceeding attacks the character of men of fair standing, and also the good order and conduct of a whole community, it seems that a proper sense of justice would have forced an examination of this witness.

Mr. President, is it not remarkable, in view of the facts I have stated, the truth of which can not be successfully controverted, that the minority of the committee should state that this man Chiles was "refused an audience?" He never applied for an audience. Hence it could not have been refused him. A subpœna was sent for him and he could not be found. His name was erased from that subpœna, as I have stated, at the instance of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE], and that of L. F. Montgomery substituted therefor. If this be a refusal of audience to him, then it is for the Senator from Mississippi to explain why he did it. And I here utterly deny that there is any foundation in fact to support the charge contained in the quotation I have just read from the views of the minority, wherein it is alleged that—

Important record evidence in possession of the witness, impeaching the assumed fairness of the financial administration of McGill, has been suppressed.

The committee has done no such thing. No such record evidence was presented to it by Chiles or any other person. If he or any other witness had such evidence in possession why was it not presented? The record of the case forces me to believe that the minority of the committee was imposed on by this man, who could not be served with the subpœna that was sent for him, and that no such record evidence exists. And I am inclined to believe that the minority agree with me in this respect, for in the earlier part of the views presented by it the statement is made that—

It was known to be difficult to beat McGill. His financial administration had been reasonably satisfactory.

How could this be if there were "record evidence * * * impeaching the assumed fairness of the financial administration of McGill?" The admission and the imputation do not harmonize.

Mr. President, this reflection on the committee and on the administration of McGill had their origin in the necessities of the men who found themselves called to account in the investigation ordered by the Senate in respect of their criminal practices in connection with the Jackson city election. When by their criminal practices they had suppressed the votes of the colored citizens of Jackson, and by this crime against the American ballot had rid themselves of what they had declared in their nominating convention to be "a just reproach upon them for so long suffering a Republican administration in the capital city of a Democratic State," they found themselves confronted by this investigation; then they began to invent excuses for their unlawful conduct. Hence the testimony given before the committee by the implicated parties and their friends is crowded with the complaints they had never thought of during the fourteen years of Mayor McGill's administration. One of the leading complaints was the inefficiency of the police force of the city. It is complained that two murders other than those committed on Christmas Eve had occurred in the city, and it is said that reformation in this regard was the prime purpose of the movement to change the city government. A great reform was needed and would come with the change.

Well, the change was made by suppressing the colored votes. Did the reform come? On the 1st day of May last, John H. Martin, editor of the New Mississippian, a newspaper that had supported William Henry for mayor in opposition to McGill, and General Wirt Adams met on one of the public streets of Jackson, and being prepared for offensive and defensive operations, as most persons in that section of the country seem to deem necessary, opened fire on each other at once. The result was that both were killed. Martin had been one of the most extreme partisans in support of the candidacy of General Henry. General Adams was one of the most conservative and respected citizens of Jackson. He had manfully endeavored to arrest the madness of the white line movement at the late city election, and, in answer to a question put to him by the committee relative to General Adams, Mayor Henry stated under oath—

He is one of the best men I ever knew.

The reform had not yet arrived. Nor does it seem to have arrived as late as the 26th of July last, when the following Associated Press telegram was sent out to the country, namely:

JACKSON, MISS., July 25.

On Monday last Roderick Lowry, a nephew of Governor Lowry, went to the residence of Mayor Henry, where his wife had gone for protection. He gained access to his wife's room, and on his wife refusing to listen to proposals for reconciliation he seized her by the throat and choked and bit her in the most tigerish manner. He then seized a heavy water pitcher, which he broke over her head, and continued striking her in the most savage manner as long as a fragment of the pitcher remained. He then seized a quart bottle and broke that also by a blow on her face. This was supplemented by savage kicks as the woman was lying on the floor. Leaving her for dead, Lowry fled to the swamps. A posse of forty mounted men have so far failed to arrest the fugitive. Mrs. Lowry's condition to-day is somewhat improved.

Mr. President, suppose these things should have transpired during the last half year of John McGill's administration instead of in the first half year of William Henry's occupation of the office of mayor of Jackson, what do you suppose the law-respecting, conservative, conscientious men who organized the movement to gain a partisan success by suppressing the votes of the colored voters of that city would have said about them? It may well be doubted if amongst all the crimes that have ever been perpetrated in Jackson another one can be found so brutally barbarous as the one described in the telegram I have read. If it had been perpetrated in the residence of John McGill when he was mayor the changes that would have been rung upon it would have been without number and without end.

But it did not occur in his house. It transpired in the residence of Mayor Henry. Was he responsible for it? I do not say that he was. He was in the house in which it transpired, but in a part other than that in which it occurred. He is entitled to the benefit of the presumption that he was not cognizant of it. But he was nearer to it than John McGill ever was to any of the crimes that have been used to excite prejudice against him, and to justify the vote suppressing crime that defeated his late candidacy. The truth of the case is that the great outcry about the few crimes mentioned in the complaint of the suppressors of the votes of the colored men of Jackson is a mere pretext behind which to hide their own greater crime against the free ballot.

Crimes such as are complained of by the men involved in this investigation are more or less frequent in many communities wherein public order generally prevails, and where the customs of the people do not invite lawless acts, and it is irrational to expect better conditions to exist in those where the carrying of deadly weapons on the person is a common practice. This of itself induces crime. And it is well to bear in mind that the crimes complained of in this case were not infractions of the municipal ordinances of the city of Jackson, but of the laws of the State of Mississippi. Hence it was the duty of the Democratic officials of the Democratic county of Hinds to move in the matter of bringing the culprits to justice. The minority of the committee says of the effect of the killing of McWillie Mitchell on the city government that—

Appalled and stunned at the crime and its consequences, it stood in helpless imbecility. It could neither protect life nor punish a murderer.

Well, if this be true, where was the Democratic sheriff and his exemplary deputy, the said L. F. Chiles? Probably it was as difficult to find the latter on that occasion as it was when the Deputy Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate visited Jackson to subpœna him to appear before the committee in this case as a witness. Of course the city authorities could not punish a murderer. That function of justice belonged to the authorities of the State of Mississippi and of Hinds County. If they had acted promptly and efficiently it might have checked the excitement which the crime occasioned, and thus have deprived the white-line movement of one of its chief supports.

Mr. President, no one can read, with unprejudiced mind, the record of the testimony presented to the Senate in this case by the committee without coming to the conclusion that the excuses, defenses, and palliations interposed in behalf of the unlawful suppression of the votes of the colored citizens of Jackson at the late election are frivolous. There is one incontrovertible fact in the case that has not been and can not be suppressed. No white man was interfered with when he tendered his vote at that election. No matter what his views were in respect of the candidates being voted for or against; no matter whether he was a Democrat, a Republican, a Prohibitionist, or Anti-Prohibitionist, or anything else, when he offered his vote it was taken without question. But no colored man voted at that election. As I have already stated one old colored man offered his vote, and was at once ejected from the polling-place by a young white man, who, as he forcibly turned him away from the polls, remarked:

Damn it, this is a white man's election, and you have no business here.

And it is clearly shown by the testimony taken and reported to the Senate that the several United States officers mentioned in the resolution of this body directing the investigation participated in the methods which brought about this result. Therefore the committee stated the exact truth in its report when it said:

Two subjects were committed to the committee for inquiry and report. These were (1) the alleged suppression of the votes of colored citizens of Jackson, Miss., at the recent municipal election in that city; (2) the alleged participation in such suppression by the United States district attorney, and by a deputy collector of internal revenue, and a deputy United States marshal.

In pursuance of the duty imposed on the committee, and the power given to it by the resolutions of the Senate, a thorough investigation of the two subjects above stated has been had. Many witnesses have been examined, and the testimony of each is submitted to the Senate with this report.

The conclusions of the committee in respect to the two subjects committed to it for investigation are affirmative in both branches of the inquiry.

There was a suppression of the votes of colored citizens at the recent municipal election of Jackson, Miss. The suppression was not partial but total. No colored citizen voted at said election. This was exceptional. For years the colored voters of Jackson had voted without obstruction. This is an admitted fact. There is nothing in all of the testimony taken by the committee that tends to controvert it.

Mr. President, the minority of the committee found it difficult to meet these conclusions and determined to interpose a demurrer to the jurisdiction of the Senate. This it did in these words, namely:

The undersigned deem it their duty to call attention to the recommendation of the committee, and make some comments thereon, and on the legal attitude of these proceedings. The recommendation gives character to the whole proceeding, and shows the purpose of the investigation. This appears to be to secure a removal of certain United States officials or employés. To institute and carry on an inquiry for such a purpose is not only a grave assumption of power, but it is more. It is a deliberate proceeding on the part of the Senate to disqualify that body from performing properly a high constitutional function. The power of impeachment rests alone with the House of Representatives. As to them the Senate has the jurisdiction only of judges, sitting and acting under oath to be fair and impartial. Manifestly, therefore, where a proceeding in the legislative branch of the Government looks to the removal of an officer of the United States it should be by impeachment, that being the only constitutional means of legislative action in that way. Any action taken by the Senate in that direction without articles of impeachment is therefore not only a clear usurpation of power, but a grave error in the disqualification coming from a partial trial and the formation of opinions which would unfit Senators from being impartial judges.

The Constitution provides that—

The President, Vice-President, and all civil officers of the United States shall be removed from office on impeachment for and conviction of treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors.

The testimony in this case shows that J. B. Harris, the implicated United States district attorney, resigned his office before the investigation was ordered. He is not a civil officer of the United States. As to him, therefore, the demurrer of the minority must be overruled. The same result must follow in respect of Livingston and Wilson, for the minority specifically says:

As to Livingston, the deputy marshal, he is not even an officer of the United States.

And—

As to Wilson, the committee are equally at fault. He, like Livingston, is not even an officer of the United States, but the mere agent of the internal-revenue collector of that district.

If the minority is satisfied with the predicament in which it has placed itself in respect of the three implicated parties named I am quite sure that I will not attempt to disturb its equanimity. It has demonstrated that so far as those parties are concerned, the Senate has not infracted the provision of the Constitution relative to the impeachment of civil officers of the United States. There never was a more complete illustration of that frequently mentioned performance of "setting up a man of straw only to knock it down" than the minority has supplied in this instance.

The next step taken by the minority in its line of argument rounds up and completes the absurdity of its position. Following immediately after the last quoted paragraph this passage occurs, namely:

This is no new question. In the year 1834 the Senate undertook to perform a similar act towards General Jackson. The protest of that great man, dated April 15 of that year, contains a clear exposition of the constitutional powers and duties of the Senate, as well as a just rebuke of the action we are now commenting on. We refer the Senate to that protest as containing the true doctrine on the subject, contenting ourselves with one single quotation, as follows:

"It is only in the exercise of its judicial powers, when sitting as a court for the trial of impeachments, that the Senate is expressly authorized and necessarily required to consider and decide upon the conduct of the President or any other public officer. * * * Cases may occur in the course of its legislative or executive proceedings in which it may be indispensable to the proper exercise of its powers that it should inquire into and decide upon the conduct of the President or other public officer; and in every such case its constitutional right to do so is cheerfully conceded. But to authorize the Senate to enter on such a task in its legislative or executive capacity, the inquiry must actually grow out of and tend to some legislative or executive action. The decision when expressed must take the form of some appropriate legislative or executive act."

Nothing of this kind is pretended here. No legislation is pretended to be necessary or is recommended.

The impeachment branch of this position has been disposed of by the minority itself, as I have already shown. General Jackson disposed of the rest of it when he wrote the lines which the minority quoted from him and which I have just read. Let me here repeat a sentence or two from this quotation in order to show how effectually General Jackson unhorsed the minority even before it had a chance to mount. He said:

Cases may occur in the course of its legislative or executive proceedings in which it may be indispensable to the proper exercise of its powers that it should inquire into and decide upon the conduct of the President or other public officer; and in every such case its constitutional right to do so is cheerfully conceded.

Well, if the Senate may inquire into and decide upon the conduct of the President or other officer, is it not in possession of the entire field covered by the report of the committee in this case? Is not this investigation connected with a subject on which the Senate had entered with legislative intent? Has the minority forgotten that there is now pending on the Senate Calendar a bill reported favorably from the Committee on the Judiciary, being a bill to provide inquests under national authority? The testimony taken in this case and reported to the Senate will throw no inconsiderable light on the subject in respect of the methods resorted to to prevent persons, because of race or color, from expressing opinions or voting as they may see fit, and thus aid the legislative judgment of the Senate in arriving at correct conclusions concerning said bill, and when the Senate shall have come to its resolves as to what ought to be done it will doubtless be found in perfect accord with the declaration of General Jackson, that—

The decision when expressed must take the form of some appropriate legislative or executive act.

The facts brought out in this case, though they relate to a local municipal election, are of value as guides in the consideration of legislative propositions for the protection of the voter and his vote at elections for officers whose positions are provided for by the Constitution and laws of the United States. The later amendments to the Constitution provide in express terms for their enforcement by Congress by the instrumentalities of appropriate legislation. If in advance of such legislation it is discovered by proper investigation that United States officers or agents or those to them sustaining the relations of deputies or aids are interfering with the rights of citizens to express opinions or to vote, it is but showing a decent respect for and proper courtesy toward the Executive to inform him of the discoveries made in due course of investigations pursued by committees of either House of Congress.

It is no sufficient answer to this statement to say that the officers complained against in this particular case were not appointed by the President. They are subordinates of his subordinates. He is the head of the executive department of the Government. If officers who receive appointments from him take into the public service men who violate law or do other things harmful to the rights of citizens or detrimental to the general welfare, he may, by proper admonition to his own appointees, effect the requisite reform in each case, and it is his duty to do so. But of course he must not be held responsible in such cases until he shall be informed of the facts involved. The office of the resolutions reported by the committee in this case is to convey to the President the information reported to the Senate. This, surely, is proper and respectful, and in no degree exceeds either the power or the duty of this body. Hence in every aspect of the case the resolutions reported to the Senate, and which we now have under consideration, have complete justification.

Mr. President, we hear and read much in these days of a new force that has appeared in the business affairs of this country. So much has been said of it that at least one branch of the present Congress has ordered that it be investigated. This new force is called the trust. It has asserted itself in many departments of business. We hear of the cattle trust, the Standard Oil trust, the sugar trust, and of many others. These various trusts are being most vigorously denounced as unlawful conspiracies against the public welfare, as they undoubtedly are, because they tend to such concentrated control of all branches of business in which they have asserted themselves as to render individuals, companies, partnerships, and corporations engaged in like pursuits practically helpless. They are absorbing the business of the country, dictating the terms under which any branch of it may be conducted, destroying the element of competition, and eliminating individual enterprise. Very resolute demands are coming up from the people for the suppression of these trusts, and these demands will at no far-away day be heeded. Business will be emancipated from the trust domination and methods will be devised for the effective protection of the rights of the individual citizen, so that he may pursue his lawful calling without paying tribute to a trust.

But, Mr. President, the business trust is not the only one that should attract attention and in respect of which remedial legislation should be enacted. There is one other quite as hateful and injurious as the business trust. This is the political trust. This, like the other, disregards the general welfare and individual rights. Consider the facts and figures that I have presented relative to elections in the several States of the Union to which they pertain, and no difficulty will obstruct the judgment in determining its character and detecting its membership. It has produced wonderful results already. The data which I have presented show that this political trust has discovered how to produce a maximum result from a minimum investment. The example that demonstrates this statement is presented by the fact that the trust with 198,660 votes in the States of Alabama, Georgia, Mississippi, and South Carolina elected, in 1886, thirty-two members of the House of Representatives, when at the same election the Republican State of Iowa polled 337,431 in the selection of eleven members. Now this can not have resulted from a lack of voters in the four States.

The number of persons resident in said States who were entitled to vote at said election was greatly in excess of those possessed of that right in Iowa. Why did they not vote? Simply because the political trust which dominates in those States was working to put an "end to the political power of the negro among white men on this continent." True, the fifteenth amendment of the Constitution gave them the right to vote, but the trust holds that that amendment is invalid, and resolved that one vote in those States should be equal in political effect to three votes in Iowa and other Northern States. The execution of this resolution of the trust assured the Democratic party the majority it now has in the House of Representatives.

It will endeavor to renew that majority in the next Congress, and at the same time elect forty electors of President and Vice-President of the United States. Suppress this political trust and give to each legal voter a fair chance to cast his vote and have it counted, and that would put an end to the political power of the Democratic party in the United States. Let this result come and the rule of the solid South would be broken, and a day of most hopeful promise would dawn upon this country. We might then expect to see the color line and race issue depart, and the voters of all of the States form their party associations in accordance with their views concerning the legitimate political questions and issues that may agitate the public mind from time to time.

Mr. President, the one thing most needed in this country now is just treatment to all of its legal voters. Whatever legislation is needed to effect this result should be enacted. This will interfere with no citizen's right, but, on the contrary, will assure the rights of all. The rich man, the poor man, the white man, and the colored man will be best served by putting into impartial practice that theory of our system of government which declares the equality of all men before the law. Then we may expect to re-establish and maintain the control of the majority now crushed under the feet of the political trust, which knows no law and regards no rights that obstruct its movements in perpetuation of the rule of the minority now in force, induced by its operations. We will not do our full duty if we stop short of giving our best endeavors to the enactment of such legislation as will tend to effect the end I have indicated.

The people of this country will not do their full duty to themselves until they shall have decreed that the political trust that has been so dominant in our public affairs shall be displaced from its seat of power, and that every citizen shall be protected in the full enjoyment of his constitutionally-declared rights without regard to his station in life, his condition of fortune, or the color of his skin. Nor can we safely allow this question to be obscured by any other one. It is present in our affairs, and it will remain to either bless us or plague us as we shall elect. How soon it shall bless us or how long it shall plague us the people will have opportunity to determine in November next. Their true interest and duty, hand in hand, will meet them at the polls and remind them of the supreme character of this question. I have confidence that they will not mistake the importance of the issue and that they will decide it right. They have the power to dissolve the political trust which has subjected this Republic to the rule of the minority. They can restore it to the control of the majority. No other result will fill the measure of the supreme duty that will confront each citizen who shall cast a vote at the November election.

Mr. WALTHALL. Mr. President, it seems now to have become a prominent feature in the system of Republican party tactics to bring before the Senate of the United States from time to time the internal affairs of the Southern States for discussion. On such occasions there is usually a fierce arraignment of the Southern people for alleged offenses clearly outside the sphere of Federal legislation; and they are sometimes bitterly assailed for the existence of conditions in their midst which, if all their assailants say were conceded, can not be ameliorated by the exercise of any Federal power. These attacks are unaccompanied by the suggestion of any practical plan of remedy or redress, and hitherto they have borne no fruit but crimination and recrimination, and have had no effect but to delay the era of good-will among a reunited people, which happily has come in spite of them. But still the attacks are periodically renewed, and are always most expected when some important political campaign is pending or approaching.

Sometimes the pretexts for them have been in the shape of propositions to "investigate" alleged wrongs in the South by committees of the Senate, sometimes to confer upon a Federal judge duties akin to the functions of a mere coroner, and sometimes to prescribe peculiar regulations for Federal elections in some Southern States which are not to apply to elections in any other quarter of the Union. But in whatever form these pretexts have appeared, the sole purpose apparently has been to gain for the dominant party here some advantage in a political campaign by the dissemination among the people of bitter sectional speeches delivered on this floor, or of partisan reports which never served, if indeed they were intended as the basis of any legislation by Congress or any action by the Senate. Significant illustrations of this are furnished by what has transpired in this body in the past in relation to the State which has honored me with a seat on this floor, and I bespeak the indulgence of the Senate while I review some of the measures which from time to time have been adopted or discussed here as to that State, seemingly with no end in view but the supposed benefit which would inure to one of the great political parties of the country.

In the month of March, 1876, when it was apparent the Republicans were to be hard pressed in the Presidential election then approaching, the Senate passed a resolution providing for the appointment of a committee to investigate the election in Mississippi of the year before. The committee, composed of three Republicans and two Democrats, were directed to report to the Senate before the end of the session.

This involved the prolonged absence from their posts of duty here, when important public business was being considered, of prominent members of the body, but it insured the publication of the reports in time for the fall campaign.

This committee commenced their labors in April and concluded them in time to submit in August their voluminous report, which, with the testimony taken, much of it wholly irrelevant, fills two volumes of about one thousand pages each. Even before the report was ready it was ordered that it be printed, and thus no delay could occur in sending it out to be scattered broadcast over the Northern States.

The majority of the committee reported, among other things, that negro voters were overawed by organizations of armed men, and election outrages were perpetrated in twenty-two named counties in Mississippi; that "the Democratic victory in the State was due to the outrages so perpetrated," and that the Legislature of Mississippi was "not a legal body, and that its acts are not entitled to recognition by the political department of the Government of the United States," etc.

The report concludes with three recommendations, one in these words:

2. States in anarchy, or wherein the affairs are controlled by bodies of armed men, should be denied representation in Congress.

Now, sir, if any consequence was attached to this report even by the political friends of the majority of the committee, except for the campaign uses it might serve, and if the investigation was really ordered that it might be seen whether the power, whose existence in Congress was implied in the resolution ordering it, should be so exercised that the colored people in Mississippi might have the equal protection of the laws, how could Congress, or at least the Senate on its part, do less than put forth that power to secure those people the free enjoyment of their constitutional rights? It might have been supposed that promptly on the coming in of this report, which had cost so much of time and money, and laying aside less important duties, the Republican Senate of the United States, who sent out this strong committee to inquire into the alleged wrongs and report to the Senate before its adjournment what legislation was necessary in the premises, would have been eager to recognize the laborious and protracted endeavors of the majority of the committee to meet Republican expectations by prompt and stringent legislation to right the wrongs complained of in Mississippi.

The domestic affairs of the State had been laid bare for the committee's closest inspection and scrutiny. There had been ample opportunity for the fullest investigation, and the report was most elaborate; but no action whatever was taken or proposed in the Senate. There had been a general arraignment of the white people of Mississippi in discussing the resolution providing for the committee; this had gone to the country; the report followed as soon as it could be put in print; both did their work in the Presidential election, and those who set on foot the movement ostensibly to ascertain whether the constitutional rights of the negroes in that State were secure seemed entirely content.

At the next session of Congress the report of the majority was read at length and went into the record, but the campaign was over and Mr. Hayes had been inducted into office, the partisan report had served its party purpose, and a Senator elected by the Legislature which the committee had reported was not a legal body was admitted by a vote which lacked but one of being unanimous; and no question was ever afterwards raised upon the merits of his claim as affected by the fraud and force to which the election of the Legislature which elected him was charged in the report to be entirely due. And never from that day has that voluminous report cut any figure here, and none elsewhere except as a pretext for slanderous denunciations of Southern people in stump speeches and partisan newspapers.

But in 1884 another Presidential election occurred, in which the Republicans foresaw the danger of defeat, and early in the year they began their preparations for the contest. Among them was the passage, by this body, in the month of January of a preamble and resolution providing for an investigation, by the Committee on Privileges and Elections, of the election held in Mississippi in the preceding fall, and this time the State of Virginia was also included. The preamble in general was somewhat in the form usually employed when a pretext is desired for looking into the domestic affairs of a Southern State in connection with an election, but in the case of Mississippi the special matter recited was a newspaper report that at an election in November, 1883, in Copiah County—

There was an organized movement by members of one party to prevent members of another party from voting at that election, and to prevent free and open discussion and expression of political opinions; that this purpose was carried into execution by organized plans of terror and violence, etc.

And that a white man on election day was murdered in pursuance of a conspiracy by the members of one party because he voted with the other; that no effort was made to punish the murderers, and that the killing was approved by a public meeting composed of members of one party.

The resolution providing for the investigation of these charges was introduced by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN], and he discussed it at some length. In reference to what he termed "the allegations as to Mississippi" he said:

Still, if these allegations are true, it would be a cowardly shrinking from the gravest public duty to allow such events to deepen into precedents which would subvert the foundation of republican institutions and convert our elections into organized crimes. I do not say these allegations are true, but they come to us with such apparent seeming of truth that we are bound to ascertain their truth or falsehood by the most careful and impartial inquiry.

And in referring to the events in Copiah County he said:

But if these individual crimes involve the greater one of an organized conspiracy of a party, or a race, to deprive another party, or race of citizens, of the enjoyment of their unquestioned rights, accompanied with overt acts, with physical power sufficient to accomplish their purpose, then it becomes a national question which must be dealt with by the National Government.

The "truth or falsehood" of these charges must be ascertained, the Senator said; there must be no "cowardly shrinking from the gravest public duty," and if there was such an "organized conspiracy" as that referred to, it "must be dealt with by the National Government," and it seemed desirable to facilitate the investigation proposed, so that if the charges were true the strong arm of the United States Government might in some way be employed to redress the grievances complained of. Accordingly, on the 4th of February, 1884, it was resolved that the investigation might be made by the committee named, or any subcommittee thereof, and—

That said committee, or subcommittee, shall be authorized to proceed to said States, or either of them, and sit wherever it may be found necessary for the purposes of said investigation, etc.

Promptly the subcommittee for Mississippi was appointed, consisting of three Republicans and two Democrats, and by a party vote it was—

Resolved, That the committee proceed to New Orleans, La., for the purpose of taking testimony.

And we are doubtless expected to believe, if we can, that that point was selected as affording the greatest facilities for acquiring information as to the affairs of Mississippi, though 200 miles away from the scene of the alleged disturbances.

As I believe, there was no shadow of constitutional authority for this investigation, wherever conducted, and no justification for it in the precedents of the Senate.

The Mississippi election investigated in 1876 was a Federal election, being for Congressmen as well as State officers and members of the Legislature, and that fact was emphatically set forth in the preamble to the resolution which provided for the investigation, and, as originally offered by Mr. Morton, the preamble recited that the—Legislature then chosen will have the election of a Senator to represent that State in this body.

And it was claimed that the Senate, being the sole judge of the election returns and qualifications of its own members, was competent to institute an inquiry into an election which involved the return of a Senator.

But, sir, I feel that the facts warrant the belief that that claim was no more than a flimsy pretext for an investigation, intended to subserve a purely party purpose, for there was no such pretext for investigating the election of 1883, but it was ordered by a Republican Senate, just as the other was, and presumably for the same reason. The election in 1883 was in no sense a Federal election, and it was not pretended that it was. There were no members of Congress elected and no Senator to be elected by the Legislature chosen. It was a local election for county officers and members of the Legislature, conducted under State laws, by State officials, and did not touch Federal elections at any point, nor did it furnish any semblance of a pretext for any Federal interference or investigation. It was not pretended that any law of the United States was violated by the occurrences in Copiah, and it can not be disputed that whatever wrongs or crimes may have been committed there were violations of State laws, and that the penalty for the infraction of these laws is judicial punishment in the State courts.

But passing over what seems a most indefensible invasion of the rights and powers of a sovereign State, let us see if the real purpose in the mission of this committee was, as it professed to be, to inquire into the condition of affairs in Mississippi. If it was, why was the investigation made too narrow and too shallow to compass its object? If light was wanted as to the real state of things there, why did the committee pass around the State to conduct their investigation in a city beyond its borders? To reach any well-founded conclusion there should have been an investigation into the whole social life of Mississippi, and yet no one of the committee set his foot within the limits of the State. If they really wanted the information in reliable form which they professed to be seeking, why did they not go to the scene of the wrongs which they were to investigate and get the whole truth and publish it to the world?

This that committee was careful not to do, for industriously they avoided setting foot on the soil of the very State whose affairs they professed to be investigating and the presence of the very people of whose conduct they claimed to be seeking information. It was not because of distance, nor from lack of time, for, starting from the Capitol, they went beyond the State, far away from the spot where the chief trouble existed, and which fair-minded men all over the country who were looking to the result of their inquest for facts thought might well have been made the seat of their investigation.

But, although the committee avoided Mississippi, the majority did not fail to fill their report with grave charges and sweeping statements, and thousands of copies were sent to the country.

These charges were published and republished, and were the means of causing great numbers of people in the Northern States to regard those of their own race and blood, in the locality to which the report referred, as a band of blood-stained murderers.

But, sir, beyond exciting prejudices and stimulating bitter animosities against the Southern people, what purpose did this report serve; what action was taken or attempted, or was ever intended to be had upon it, and how far did the Senate signify that it believed all that it contained? According to the report, there were the conspiracy, the overt acts, the sufficient physical force, and all the conditions to make "the national question, which must be dealt with by the National Government," according to the Senator from Ohio, the author of the resolution.

Was it so dealt with; and if not, why not? The Senator from Ohio had warned his colleagues that there must be no "cowardly shrinking from the greatest public duty," and the investigation had been ordered professedly to ascertain the "truth or falsehood" of the allegations made. If convinced that they were true, how could the Senate, after all that had been said and done, without an abandonment of duty, fail to take prompt and decided action under the power assumed to exist when the investigation was inaugurated? If there was no such power, then the whole movement was a pretense and a sham.

When the report came in, what did the Senate do? Not one move was made, not a single word was spoken indicating any purpose or desire to do anything more than to get it before the country during the pending campaign. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR], the chairman of the committee, introduced a joint resolution:

That there be printed for distribution 150,000 copies of the report of the committee who investigated certain occurrences in Copiah County, Mississippi, together with the testimony taken by said committee and the views of the minority.

And never afterwards, except in connection with printing the document, was his voice or any other Republican's voice heard on this floor upon the subject of that report, so far as I gather from the record. Certain it is that the investigation led to no practical results, and it did not give rise to even so much as a proposition to remedy the evils which the committee so graphically described.

The report figured in the campaign, however, and figured extensively and doubtless effectively in some quarters; but, sir, men were left to judge each for himself what the motive was in that Presidential year for flooding the country with such a publication, and whether there really was "cowardly shrinking" by a Republican Senate "from the gravest public duty," or an ascertainment after examination that allegations were unfounded which the report stated to be true, or a known lack of constitutional authority to make the investigation.

I have referred to these investigations of 1876 and 1884 that it may be seen and known how and why they were conducted, and that it may be fully understood that in both cases when the partisan purpose which seemed to be in view had been accomplished nothing was done and nothing attempted in the direction indicated as the pretext for the investigations.

But this is not all. There was an election for Congressmen in 1886, and it was given out before the campaign opened that a great struggle was to be made to reverse the majority in the House, so that the Republicans might have control there as here. Preparations for the coming conflict were begun early in the spring, and on the 26th day of March the honorable Senator from Massachusetts, abandoning the plan of "investigation," for reasons which he explained, introduced his Federal inquest bill, which never came to a vote, either at that session or the next, and died at the close of the Forty-ninth Congress, to be resurrected, however, at this session, and it may yet be made to do duty in another campaign. In the remarks which he submitted at the time he introduced this bill that Senator did not attempt to conceal that the measure, though general in its terms, had special reference to the State of Mississippi and to the Democratic party in that State. A deplorable race disturbance at Carrollton, in no way connected with politics or with any election so far as could be learned then or since, was seized upon as the pretext for this extraordinary measure and for the Senator's remarks, from which I extract the following:

Such occurrences have unhappily been too frequent in our history. When they are investigated by the Senate or the House of Representatives the investigation is very apt to take a political turn, and the persons who defend, or apologize, or extenuate the occurrence say that it has no political significance, it is an accident, or it is sporadic, or it is not approved by the community where it occurred. However that may be, one significant fact remains, that these things happen sometimes early in the year just before an important election, sometimes just as the campaign is beginning, and sometimes at the election itself, with one uniform result: It is all one way. In every one of these homicides the political opponents of the Democratic party are the victims and some Democrat is the murderer.

The time for holding elections in Mississippi is fixed by a public law which was in reach of the Senator when he made this statement. Had he sought the information he would have found that when the occurrence transpired of which he was speaking, there was no election pending in Mississippi and none appointed to occur for nearly eight months to come; that no political campaign was beginning or about to begin; that no conventions or primaries were being initiated or discussed; that out of the last election in that State, then several months past, had grown no strife nor animosity, and attending it and the campaign preceding it there was no political excitement.

When the Senator's remarks were made with deliberation and measured phrase there was not a scintilla of evidence offered and none, as I believe, existing—no fact stated in any reputable newspaper of either party showing that the Carrollton tragedy had its origin in politics or was traceable or due to any election, past, present, or to come. And it is a noteworthy fact that in a speech on this bill which he delivered during a debate on an adjournment resolution in the closing hours of the session and when it was absolutely certain it could not then become a law, the Senator read an extract from a pamphlet which he said was "printed in Washington in 1886 by Mr. Frederick Douglass, the most distinguished and conspicuous colored man in the country," distinctly stating that the occurrence in question took place "in the absence of all political excitement," and "when there was no pending election."

Yet, in the face of this proof offered by himself, and in face of the fact which can not be disputed, that this occurrence was a race disturbance, and in no sense political, the honorable Senator has seen fit to let his broad declaration stand with all its unjust and damaging implications that—

In every one of these homicides the political opponents of the Democratic party are the victims, and some Democrat is the murderer.

And whatever party advantage could be made to accrue to the Republicans in the North from the perversion of a great calamity resulting from race diversity in the South, into political oppression by the Democrats in that section, the Republicans enjoyed it in the campaign of 1886, though obtained, I respectfully submit, at the expense of the real truth of the case.

And when we consider the partisan uses that have been made in the past of the misfortunes and afflictions of the Southern people growing out of the great race problem which confronts them, we had no reason to be surprised at much that we have witnessed here during the present session of Congress. This is a Presidential year, and the last hopes of the Republican party are depending upon the result of the approaching election. Judging from the past it was to be expected that even earlier in the session than usual measures affecting the Southern States only should be introduced here, and that some Republican Senators, while offering no practical remedy for wrongs which they allege to exist, should make opportunities in season and out of season to discuss Southern affairs, and appeal to the bitterest and most unworthy sectional prejudices for political effect in the Northern States.

The production of a Senator's credentials from the State of Louisiana was made the pretext for the introduction of a resolution to investigate the late election in that State by a committee whose chairman had already furnished a number of reasons against that plan of proceeding. And in the discussion of that resolution in advance of the investigation, and in the absence of the facts which it is the professed purpose of the resolution to ascertain, the Senator from New Hampshire has sought to have the case prejudged, and for a large part of two days he belabored us with his scrap-book of Southern outrage items, which he seems to have been collecting from the time James K. Polk, a Southerner, was nominated for the Presidency down to the present day.

And when it was reported that at a mere municipal election in Jackson, Miss., plainly involving a question of race, in which the white voters, who were chiefly Democrats, prevailed, negro votes had been suppressed—as it has been reported that at an important State election held since then in the North, where the Republicans prevailed, white votes were openly and shamelessly bought in the market with money—a pretext was promptly found for an investigation of that unimportant election which occurred in a Southern State in which there was a triumph for the white race and for the Democracy, which comprises most of that race in that section.

The investigation has been completed, and the majority of the committee who made it have submitted their report to the Senate. That report furnishes no groundwork for any Congressional legislation and offers no practical suggestion of a remedy for any evil it recites, but when freely circulated it may engender prejudice and thus serve a party purpose in the present important campaign. Let us consider the matter of the Jackson election and the action taken upon it here and that which is proposed.

The Senate on the 12th day of January last instructed the Committee on the Judiciary to inquire into the suppression of the votes of colored citizens at that election, and the alleged participation therein of a United States district attorney, a deputy internal revenue collector, and a deputy United States marshal, "and to report the facts to the Senate." Promptly that able and dignified law committee of this body, through a subcommittee, entered upon the labor of collecting here the facts connected with a town election in a State remote from the capital, and after the investigation had extended through more than six months of the present important session of Congress, on the 23d of July they submitted the report of the majority.

This with more than four hundred pages of printed testimony, relevant and irrelevant, accompanied by the views of the minority, is now before the Senate. As the voluminous testimony is discussed in the reports, and the facts as before us speak for themselves, I shall not inflict upon the Senate any lengthy recital of details or particulars. Without quoting at large from the witnesses I shall content myself in the main with a presentation, as brief as I can make it, of the substance of the proofs, showing the conditions and occurrences at Jackson, and Senators who are interested to know the real truth of the case can test the accuracy of my statement by reference to the pamphlet before them, in which is embodied all the testimony that was admitted.

There is some conflict in the testimony, and under the circumstances this was to be expected, but the weight and effect of it amount to this in substance: For fourteen years, prior to December last, John McGill had been mayor of Jackson, Miss., in virtue of elections held biennially in that city, the capital of a Democratic State.

In the language of an intelligent witness, who has long been his friend and supporter—

He was a Republican, but he has never been elected as a Republican.

And another witness, himself a Republican, says McGill—

Has never run as a Republican.

His administration had been fairly good in respect of the city finances, but unsatisfactory and most inefficient as to the enforcement of police regulations against vice and immorality, the preservation of good order, and the suppression of crime. Concerning these there were serious and repeated complaints, and his maladministration in these respects went on from bad to worse, until, at the election held in 1884, there was an organized movement to defeat him with a "citizens' ticket." Some leading white Republicans were prominent in this movement, notably Hon. W. H. Gibbs, who had been a high officer of the State when his party was in power, and some leading colored Republicans, including ministers of the gospel and the head of the colored school in the city. In the canvass white and colored speakers severely arraigned McGill for the toleration of open immorality and for his failure to execute the laws and preserve the peace and order of the city.

It is a rare condition when any white man can hold the colored voters against the appeals of their preachers; but McGill had this power, and by adding the bulk of this vote to his white support he defeated the citizens' movement by a decisive majority. Ex-Chancellor Brame thus commented on this result in his testimony before the committee:

So far as numbers are concerned, the city government in Jackson has always had the advantage, because it combined the saloon-keepers, the gamblers, and those who were directly interested in the city offices, and could, as a rule, influence the negro vote. I say that these influences were combined on that side; I mean in the main that is true.

McGill had many elements of strength. He was plausible, sensible, and a shrewd politician. He had patronage to bestow, and some of this he conferred upon his political opponents. He was the foreman of a fire company and belonged to the Knights of Labor and various other organizations, including, as one witness understood, "a colored benevolent society." His hold upon the body of the colored voters, the testimony shows, was well-nigh absolute, and he had some friends among the best men of the city.

After the election of 1884 some of the most active friends of law and order, as the last hope of ridding the capital of the State of the rule of so objectionable an officer as they considered McGill, appealed to the Legislature to repeal the city charter, and the testimony shows their efforts were successful to the extent of securing a favorable report from the judiciary committee of the house of representatives, though the Democratic Legislature declined to adopt so extreme a measure of relief. Upon this subject a witness says:

About four years ago the condition of the city under Mr. McGill's administration had become so bad that an application was made to the Legislature to repeal the charter of the town, and there was a good deal of feeling manifested about that. Bawdy houses were licensed everywhere (that is, permitted); lewd women made their appearance upon the streets anywhere, at any hour of the day; there was drunkenness, and no attempt to suppress it; there seemed to be no return whatever for the taxes which were paid. And then it was that an appeal was made to have Mr. McGill turned out.

Failing in all else, a law-and-order league was established, to aid by open and peaceable and legal means in the enforcement of the law. A prominent Republican, a leading member of this organization, testifies that it was necessary to form it, because the city administration would not enforce the laws, that it was composed of the best citizens of the community, and that it had "most, if not all, the ministers of the town as members." In reference to one of the open and constant violators of the law, whom the city administration seemed especially to favor, this witness said:

It was a notable fact that he had right there on the public street a saloon and a room adjoining that saloon, and this room had a window opening out on the pavement, and lewd women were seen there time and again, cursing, swearing, playing cards, and drinking, and we held that that was a disorderly house.

From these extracts, and many more might be quoted, some idea may be formed of the burdens the people of Jackson were bearing under a city administration fastened upon them mainly by colored votes; but graver calamities, including the bloodshed of some of their best citizens, were in store for that long-suffering community.

In the month of August, 1886, under the local-option law of Mississippi, there was an election in Hinds County, in which Jackson is situated, to test the sense of the voters in the matter of prohibiting the sale of intoxicating liquors.

Up to that time there had been the kindest relations and friendliest feelings between the races in Jackson, and in that election, and in all preceding it, there had been no interference with the colored voters and no pretense that their votes had not been always fairly counted. This is abundantly established by white and black witnesses alike, and is not disputed but expressly conceded in the report of the majority. J. J. Spellman, an educated colored man of Northern birth, a Republican politician, and an editor who has lived twenty years in Mississippi, and has held various high positions in both the State and Federal Governments, when his party was in power, testified as follows:

It has been a matter of pride with me, in my travels throughout the North, when people have asked me how it is that I have managed to live in Mississippi, I have told them that I enjoyed as much freedom in Jackson as I did in Massachusetts or in any other Northern State. There was a real good feeling there.

This witness says the first struggle between the two races was on the prohibition question.

The prohibition contest was in no sense a contest between the two political parties, and in the nature of the issue it could not be. Democrats and Republicans were on either side. With the Prohibitionists were the ministers, white and colored, and a majority of the white people. And of the opposition were some prominent whites, most of them friendly to McGill, McGill himself and his administration, and the body of the colored voters, who in this instance, as once before, could not, as Spellman testifies, be controlled by their colored preachers.

The campaign was heated and bitter to the last degree. As going to show the temper of the people and how the peace of the city was endangered, see what the witness Barr says in relation to an anti-Prohibition meeting:

This meeting was very largely attended by both sides; I went to the meeting myself, but I did not get in the room. It was a notable fact that the ammunition and arms belonging to the penitentiary had been brought down there and stored in the city hall, so that in case there was a riot there they could be used against the Prohibitionists. That building was surrounded that night by the police, the saloon-keepers, the gamblers, etc., who were all armed and took no pains to conceal their arms. They were heavily armed and ready for an attack. These policemen and other city authorities were there as participants and not as preservers of the peace. Their action all along during that campaign had been just in that line. They had been partisans and not preservers of the peace. I say there was apprehension on the part of everybody around there that there would be trouble.

In the election the Prohibitionists triumphed in the county at large, but were defeated in the city, mainly by force of the colored vote.

While the campaign was in progress a newspaper called the Sword and Shield, edited by Roderick Gambrell, was the Prohibition organ and the New Mississippian, published in the same building, edited by John H. Martin, who was Gambrell's personal friend, vigorously cooperated with the Sword and Shield in warmly supporting the prohibition cause.

The editors were both young men of capacity, courage, and much earnestness of character. They were the zealous and fearless champions of prohibition, and in their ardent advocacy of the cause they had at heart they sometimes dealt severely with those who differed from them in action and opinion.

This did not cease when the prohibition election had passed, and some prominent opponents of the movement were criticised unsparingly, and, as many thought, unjustly. Among these was Col. Jones S. Hamilton, a friend and supporter of McGill and the chairman of the anti-prohibition committee, a prominent Democrat, a member of the State senate, and a man of standing, influence and ability. The appearance of what is described in the testimony as a very violent article in the Sword and Shield assailing him, resulted in a meeting between him and Mr. Gambrell, in which Gambrell was killed and Hamilton desperately wounded; and since this investigation began Mr. Martin and General Adams, one of the oldest and most prominent citizens of the city, and its postmaster, have met and killed each other, the outcome of articles offensive to General Adams which appeared in the New Mississippian.

The testimony shows that many believe the deadly conflict between Gambrell and Hamilton could have been prevented if McGill's police had been vigilant and efficient, and some charged, though it has not been established, that the chief of police was implicated in the homicide.

I refer to these matters because they figure so extensively in the testimony that what the witnesses say concerning them can not be ignored, and many newspaper articles are brought forward and play a prominent part in the investigation, especially those taken from the New Mississippian.

John H. Martin, the editor of that paper, was a bold and brilliant writer, and the witnesses describe him as a man of extreme views, given to intemperate expressions; he was a decided Democrat and an uncompromising prohibitionist.

Naturally, such a man had a following. He was a lawyer by profession, and when Hamilton was charged in the courts with the murder of Gambrell, Martin was one of the attorneys for the prosecution. The preliminary investigation at Jackson, and Hamilton's jury trial, which on the State's application, was had in an adjoining county, excited the people of Jackson but little less than the prohibition election had done. The friends of Gambrell claimed that he had been murdered, and the friends of Hamilton claimed that he was innocent of any crime, and that the pursuit of him in the courts amounted to persecution. Hamilton has been acquitted by a jury since this investigation began. The excitement was kept alive and intensified by the prolonged investigations of the case, which were had, first, at Jackson on the preliminary inquiry, and afterwards in a neighboring town where the jury trial occurred, and also by the freest discussion in the press.

After Gambrell was killed, according to the testimony, the articles in the New Mississippian were even more intemperate than before.

The 2d day of January, 1888, was the time fixed by law for the mayor's election in Jackson, and that community had been under a constant and painful strain of excitement for more than a year from the causes to which I have alluded. McGill was a candidate, and those who opposed his election, whether because he was an active anti-prohibitionist or because they thought his administration afforded but little protection to life and property, had no purpose to present a candidate against him. It seemed hopeless to do so, in view of his influence, especially with the negro voters, though the condition of the city seemed to call loudly for some radical change in the administration of its affairs.

That condition as it existed on the day before Christmas is graphically described by a Republican witness, Mr. Baldwin, who was a warm supporter of McGill, on pages 123 and 124 of the testimony, and also in the Advertiser, a paper which was edited by one of McGill's stanchest Republican friends.

Various other witnesses describe it and aver that neither life nor property was safe in the city. According to the testimony ruffianism, vandalism, and general lawlessness prevailed, and it is not pretended, though McGill and his chief of police both testified before the committee, that any arrests were made or even attempted.

That night the community, in which there had been no cessation of extreme excitement for more than a year, and from causes with some of which, in the opinion of many of the white population, McGill had been identified, and for others they considered him directly responsible, was horrified by the brutal murder in the dark of a young white man by a negro butcher, abetted, as was charged, by two other negroes, one of them a policeman under McGill's administration. McWillie Mitchell, the young man so murdered, belonged to one of the oldest and most respected families in the State, and was connected by blood or marriage with a large number of the best citizens of the city. He was popular with all classes of the people, and the young men especially were devotedly attached to him.

Straightway, wrought up to the intensest degree of excitement by the sight of the bloody body of their comrade and by the details of the brutal murder, as they were recounted in their presence, some of these young men, under the leadership of a pronounced Republican who had been repeatedly called by his party to positions of trust and distinction in their organization, formed what they termed the Young Men's White League, of which this Republican, Mr. L. F. Montgomery, was unanimously chosen the captain. The first act of this league was to pass a resolution for the appointment of a committee to ascertain the whereabouts of the two negroes supposed to be implicated in the murder of their young friend, the object of the league being, as Captain Montgomery described it, "to avenge the death of McWillie Mitchell," and the purpose was to do this if not by law then without law.

This league was an oath-bound society, and its membership was to be strictly concealed from the world. Witnesses differ as to its numbers, but a member of it called by the majority, who testified with a list before him, was not able to furnish the names of more than twenty-two who ever attended one of its meetings.

The proceedings of the White League, of limited membership, and composed of some young men under great exasperation, must not be confounded with the action of the body of the white people of Jackson. To confuse them will be to ignore the most important features in the testimony, and to do the grossest injustice to a very large majority of those people who, the testimony shows, openly condemned those proceedings, both individually and in a public meeting. I will revert to the action of these young men hereafter, and turn now to that of the main body of the people.

Young Mitchell was buried on Monday. There had been no inquest held to investigate the circumstances of the killing, McGill had the power under the law to hold this inquest and his attention was called to the matter, and in the murder of Mitchell, as he well knew, his own policeman was suspected of complicity. Two reputable white men living in the town witnessed the tragedy, but the chief of police was content to confine his "investigation" to talking to three colored men, one of them the policeman charged to be an abettor in the murder, two colored women, and two other parties not shown to have been present at the killing.

It could not be expected that the excitement in the city would very soon abate which had been created by the murder of young Mitchell by an enraged and powerful negro, who approached him from the rear and held him with one arm around his body while he cut his throat with a butcher knife. As the details of this atrocious deed were discussed it served but to intensify the indignation of the people. That the negro policeman abetted the murder of young Mitchell there seemed to them no doubt, and in the testimony no room for doubt is left. Some of the best men in Mississippi, intelligent and conservative, as their statements show, have proven that many of the people believed that neither life nor property was safe under that city government in which negroes held positions of responsibility and authority, and repeated acts of lawlessness and bloodshed had been committed which they believed were due to the inefficiency of the administration.

Under these circumstances of aggravation and insecurity, what wonder is it that the body of the white people, finding upon examination that they had a decided majority on the books of registration, were moved to take steps to secure McGill's defeat, that they assembled for this purpose and appointed a campaign "committee of one hundred," and that the movement was put upon a footing where white men of all parties might stand together—Democrats and Republicans, Prohibitionists and anti-Prohibitionists, those who loved their own race better than any other, reformers and all the friends of peace and law and order.

And it should be no matter of surprise that Republicans as well as Democrats were willing in that exigency that the revolt against what they considered bad government should be conducted under any party banner and with any political battle-cry which would serve best to rally the white voters of the city and draw from McGill that contingent of white support without which he must be defeated, though the solid negro vote were cast in his favor. Mr. Barr, a Republican, who had previously voted for McGill because he was his friend, speaking of the programme of the campaign committee, of which he was a leading member, as he had been one of the most active of those who inaugurated the movement against McGill, says:

My understanding of it was that we were to organize our forces, raise the Democratic standard, and force in all the Democratic voters. A great many of those, you understand, had been anti-Prohibitionists, and in many cases before had voted for McGill. The committee discussed that and determined to raise the Democratic standard and force all Democrats to come out, at the same time inviting all Republicans and anybody else who saw fit to participate in the election to come in.

He further says:

We discussed the popularity of our candidates. Mr. Henry was an anti-Prohibitionist, but he was not objectionably so, and we knew that we could concentrate the Prohibition vote on him—because he was not objectionable as an anti-Prohibitionist: we thought he was not committed to that cause—we knew that we could concentrate the Prohibition vote on him; we felt that he would also carry a certain class there—Hamilton's friends; Henry was in some way connected with Hamilton, I believe, and had been in the office with him in the Gulf and Ship Island Railroad, as secretary—that he could carry that vote, which had formerly voted with Hamilton for McGill. This is why we wanted to raise the Democratic standard to force all Democrats in, and by doing that we felt sure we could carry the election. That is the way I felt about it, at least.

And when reminded, in the course of his examination, that he was a Republican, participating in what was called a "Democratic meeting," he answered:

A. Yes, sir. The greatest idea with me was delivering the city from a corrupt and inefficient administration.

And he testified to his unqualified approval of the resolutions which were passed.

Among the Republicans who were in that movement, and some of them leaders in it, were several ex-Federal officers, a number of gentlemen who had represented their party in such positions as delegate to the national convention which nominated Blaine and Logan, secretary of the Blaine and Logan club, secretary of a Republican Congressional convention, secretary of a Republican county executive committee, as well as the chairman of the present Republican executive Congressional committee, and others less conspicuous.

It would have been strange indeed, under the exciting circumstances to which I have alluded, if there had not been some heated discussion and unguarded and intemperate expressions in the proceedings as they occurred or as they were reported or commented upon in the New Mississippian, so often referred to in the testimony. Naturally the editor of that paper, zealously supporting the reform movement, exhorted his readers to stand by the nominated ticket; he strove to arouse and stimulate his followers and to that end employed passionate expressions which others disapproved; and Republicans and Democrats, Prohibitionists and anti-Prohibitionists, alike appealed to the people to forget past differences and party affiliations for the time and join in the movement.

Under the excitement prevailing in that community, where there had been no repose in the popular mind, and as many thought no security for many months, there may have been, and doubtless were, some things said and done which will not square with our ideas of what was fitting when we deliberately consider the occurrences from a great distance and contemplate the scene and surroundings unaffected by the considerations which operated on the outraged community. Still, the proof makes it clear that the action of the people was in substance no more than to nominate a ticket to defeat a mayor under whose rule they did not feel safe, and to take steps through committees and otherwise to bring out the white voters to elect it.

The effort and intention, as the testimony shows, were not to suppress the negro votes, but to overcome it by a solid white vote. But the feeling of race antagonism, awakened by the murder of a white man by a negro, abetted by a negro officer, was running high in the community, and it is not surprising that the most sedate and thoughtful men in the city should have feared that the assembling of large bodies of whites and blacks on election day would lead to a race collision. For this reason such men, with the good of the community at heart, advised McGill, who had the negro vote at his command, to withdraw from the contest for the peace and safety of the city. This wise and timely counsel, though it came from his personal friends, he rejected, and proposed instead that the negroes themselves, over whom his control seemed absolute, should take no part in the election either as voters or candidates; and that thereafter no negro should be placed on duty as a policeman.

This proposition the campaign committee rejected as "impracticable and containing stipulations which they do not think any one is authorized to make and carry out," and a counter-proposition to submit the claims of the candidates to the white voters at a primary election which, unlike a regular election, is governed wholly by agreement, was rejected by McGill.

The negroes, after McGill had conferred with their leaders, formally resolved, on Wednesday before the election, that they would not vote and withdrew their candidates. And on the day following the publication of their resolutions the "red circular," purporting to be the resolutions of the White League, which cuts a prominent figure in the testimony, made its appearance on the streets.

This circular, which was issued and distributed through the town, apparently without any responsible authority, the testimony has since shown is attributed to John H. Martin, the editor of the New Mississippian and a member of the campaign committee, who, as it afterwards appeared, was also a member of the Young Men's White League. The testimony shows, and McGill himself says, the circular—

Was not the cause of the colored people coming to their determination.

And Mr. Clifton, his friend and supporter, says:

That was a matter entirely separate and apart from any movement to oust Mayor McGill from office.

This circular was promptly and repeatedly disavowed and condemned by the supporters of General Henry, who was nominated against McGill, and on the evening of the day it appeared a citizens' meeting, two-thirds of it composed of Henry's supporters and presided over by one of them, in which, a Republican supporter of McGill testifies, three-fourths or four-fifths of the property of the city was represented, unanimously passed the following resolution:

Resolved, That this meeting has no sympathy with, but strongly disapproves of any movement looking to the use of intimidation or violence at the ensuing municipal election; that it is the sense of this meeting that if any such movement is on foot it is the outcome of immature thought, and would be indefensible in any forum of law or morals, and that we implore any citizens who may contemplate it to pause, reconsider, and abandon it.

McGill was defeated at the election by a large majority, though he received a respectable white vote owing to causes which have been alluded to and in spite of the appeals for united action of the whites which had been made. The majority of the committee report that the negro vote was suppressed at this election, and endeavor by argument to fix the responsibility for what was done upon the Democratic party. To do this they are driven to contend that some identification has been established between the White League and the body of citizens, chiefly Democrats, who organized to defeat McGill, from whom the existence of the league was concealed by the few who knew of it, and to utterly ignore the mass of testimony which shows that many of the leading spirits in the movement were Republicans devoted to their party.

To support their conclusion they refer to inflammatory articles in the New Mississippian, a Democratic paper, when it appears that the course of that paper was disapproved by the supporters of General Henry. They even refer to a head-line printed above a notice which appeared in that paper as "an effective connecting link between it and the resolutions of the White League," when the author of the notice swore positively that the head-line, unobjectionable as he wrote it, was changed after it left his hands and the word "white-line" inserted by the printer or some other person.

To support their charge that "the two organizations were working in perfect harmony and to a common end" the majority emphasize the fact that Martin, the editor of the New Mississippian, was the author of the resolution known as the Red Circular, when the testimony shows that fact was not developed until this investigation began, and certainly those who were ignorant of it can not be prejudiced by it. And they lay great stress upon the alleged circumstance that "many members of the White League were also members of the committee of one hundred," when the witnesses named but few who belonged to both organizations (and some of these dispute the fact), and it is proven, that the members of the White League were bound by an oath to conceal their membership from all other persons.

Referring to the resolutions of the White League and the New Mississippian, the majority say:

> The spirit manifested in those resolutions and evinced by the articles published in that paper seem to have permeated the entire movement that supported the candidacy of Mr. Henry.

And they add:

> This is made clearly apparent by the evidence taken by the committee, when it appears all through the testimony, if men of the highest character can be believed, that both the resolutions and the articles were disapproved by those engaged in the movement.

Claiming to have established the suppression of the colored vote, the majority proceed to argue that the officials, Harris, Wilson, and Livingston (the first having resigned and the other two being mere deputies), whose conduct in respect of the matter they were authorized to investigate, participated in the suppression, though they all appeared and made their sworn denials and were supported by every witness examined who was with them in the movement to defeat McGill.

The majority go further, and class with these officials mentioned two postal clerks named Fitzgerald, whose conduct they were not authorized to pass upon—for one of whom an alibi was distinctly proven, and the other denied, under oath, what is now charged against him and was supported by witnesses who can not be impeached.

The majority did not stop here; but under a resolution in terms limiting their authority to an investigation and report of "the facts," they venture to volunteer the advice that the officials named should be promptly dismissed the service, and they invite the Senate, by passing the resolutions which they propose, to join them in this and to send a copy of the report to the President for the purpose, apparently, of instructing him in the duties of his high office.

This gratuitous and, as it appears to me, unlawful action of the majority, is so thoroughly exposed in the views submitted by the minority that I desire to call attention to an extract from their report:

> As to Livingston, the deputy marshal, he is not even an officer of the United States. He is a mere representative of the marshal who appoints him and who is responsible for all the deputy's acts. It certainly can not be necessary to remind the Senate that no man can be an officer of the United States unless he be appointed by the President, or a head of a Department or a court of law. Livingston, then, being a mere agent of the marshal, and responsible to him for his acts, is beyond the power of the Senate or the President to remove. He would be removable alone by his principal, the marshal, but for a statute, which authorizes the judge of the circuit or district court in which he serves to remove him. (See Revised Statutes, section 780.) So it appears that the Committee on the Judiciary, in directing these resolutions to be sent to the President, has mistaken not only the power of the President, but has undertaken to interfere with the exercise of power vested in a judge. Possibly, the persecution of this man is not so important a thing as to warrant the Senate not only in transgressing the bounds of its own jurisdiction, but also in invading the sanctity of the judicial department itself.
> As to Wilson, the committee are equally at fault. He, like Livingston, is not even an officer of the United States, but the mere agent of the internal-revenue collector for that district, who appoints him and is responsible for his acts. (See Revised Statutes, section 3148.) That an officer, responsible for many thousand dollars of the revenue of the Government, should be entitled to select his own agents, for whose acts he is responsible on his bond, as is declared by the statute above cited, seems too clear for dispute. Upon what principle, then, can his superior officer, the President, undertake to dictate to him as to whom he shall employ and whom he shall dismiss? So far as the President is concerned, the recommendation of the committee is that he shall, as the committee has done, usurp a power denied to him by the Constitution and laws, and to impertinently intrude his office into disturbing the relations between a public officer and his employé, for whose fidelity the public officer is responsible on his bond.
> The Fitzgeralds are probably, what neither Wilson nor Livingston is, United States officers. But as to them the President has no power of appointment or removal. (See section 4025.) This can be done only by the Postmaster-General. A Cabinet officer is a constitutional and legal officer. The President, it is true, appoints him, and may remove him; but as to any power vested by law in him he is responsible to the law. Where he has a discretion, the President can not control it in any respect whatever. He is as much a constitutional officer as the President himself. He is as much responsible in the courts, including impeachment, as the President himself. The President may remove him if he don't desire to keep him, but the President can not perform the duties and functions vested in him by law, nor control him in their performance. The President is no autocrat; he is a mere servant of the people, as all other officers are. He has no powers not vested in him by law or the Constitution. He may appoint officers by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, but he can not discharge the duties of the offices.

The proposed resolutions may be adopted by a party vote, but if the action of the President which was applauded by the American people when this body last sought to dictate his duty to that highest functionary in the Government can be taken as an earnest of his future course and a fair exhibition of his official independence, the passage of these resolutions must prove vain and unavailing. This result is doubtless contemplated by the able lawyers and statesmen who proposed the resolutions; but their report will be sent to the country, and on its allegations the Democratic party, as a party, will be charged throughout the North in the pending campaign with all the responsibility and consequences of what was no more nor less than the outcome of race diversity—a phase of that endless problem with which it is the doom of the Southern people to be ever struggling and contending. For although many causes conspired to produce a condition at Jackson conducive to an outburst of popular excitement, there can be no room for doubt that the culmination sprang directly out of race prejudice, developed by the atrocious murder of a white man by a negro, abetted by a negro officer of the peace. All through the testimony this plainly appears, especially in the intemperate resolutions of the Young Men's White League, which older citizens discountenanced and deplored, in every line of which the spirit of race antipathy, suddenly aroused, is breathed in heated and passionate expressions. But nowhere in these resolutions does the word "Democrat" or "Republican" appear, and the very caption which they bear shows both their character and their source and forbids the idea that they originated with any political party or were intended to subserve any political or party purpose. That caption was:

> A blast from the youth. The young men of Jackson utter their ultimatum.

And, sir, even if the proof had shown that the effect of the action of a few young white men, under circumstances of great aggravation and intense excitement, was practically to disfranchise the negro voters of that city at that single election, their treatment of those voters without law was no harsher than other negro voters had received in this very city through the forms of law, without the same provocation or extenuation. The inviolability of negro suffrage and the right of the majority to rule are recognized by all parties here; but, sir, is the regard of the Republican party for negro suffrage as sacred as it is claimed to be? If so let me ask, why did a Republican Congress abolish it in the District of Columbia?

Why did they strike down the right of the majority to rule right here in the shadow of the national Capitol. The experiment of negro suffrage was tried in this District under more favorable circumstances to its complete success than is possible anywhere else on earth. Here the blacks occupy a higher plane of civilization than in any of the Southern States. There are more men of intelligence and moral character, more rich men among them here than in any other community on the continent of America. There were more safeguards against mistakes in the exercise of the right of suffrage and the legislation which might follow, in the power of Congress to revise and control such legislation. There were advantages and assurances against any evil to result from negroes voting here which no State could possess. Yet, sir, the Congress of the United States—a Republican Congress—with a single blow abrogated negro suffrage and destroyed the very existence of local self-government here in the District of Columbia. It may have been necessary—I am not discussing that—but it shows that there are interests of property and society which Republicans hold higher than the negro's right to vote or the majority's right to rule. And here I desire to call attention to the fact, and emphasize it, that the only reactionary measure on the subject of negro suffrage—the only Government action depriving the black man of his right to vote, already vested in his race—was the measure of a Congress of which the Senate and the House, as well the President, were Republican.

No sacred regard for the inviolability of suffrage and the rule of the majority can explain the investigations and the wholesale denunciations which we sometimes hear of alleged election wrongs in Democratic States in the South when great crimes against the ballot—if we are to believe all we hear which comes to us with the appearance of truth—are committed in Republican States of the North and pass unnoticed here. Those who feel able to do so should inform the people of this country why it is that an election fraud committed upon a negro in a Democratic State in the South is dealt with by Republicans here as a more damning crime than such a fraud committed upon a white man in a Republican State in the North? Is the intimidation which has been charged against the South more dangerous to public liberty than the corruption and bribery which are the weapons of milder partisans and shrewder political managers in some other quarters of the Union? Is not its influence less lasting and less fatal than the purchase of a Legislature by a rich monopoly or the control of elections by the financial contributions of wealthy and unscrupulous men?

On the 30th of April last the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] said on this floor that great election frauds had been committed in his own State in 1886, and that—

It is now conceded by men of all parties that those were shameless, scandalous, monstrous frauds, as bad as any that were ever committed in the South.

He charged that they were—

Purely the work of the Democratic party.

But it is the same party whose conduct in Copiah he made the pretext for his resolution to investigate the Mississippi election in 1883. Why, when he was able to prefer so grave a charge on his own responsibility, could he not have a Senatorial committee organized to invade Ohio and look into the internal affairs of that State in 1886, as he had done upon kindred accusations based upon mere hearsay in the case of Mississippi but three years before?

What is there that gives the Congress of the United States power over a sovereign State in the South, which no statesman is audacious enough to claim for it, when a Northern State is involved? Who will affront the intelligence of the American people by avowing the real ground of such discrimination to be that Mississippi is a Southern State, and Democratic, and Ohio is a Republican State in the North? And, Mr. President, how does it happen that the taking of human life, by a body of armed men, in violation of State laws, when it occurs in a Southern State, and negroes are the victims, gives rise to the introduction of a measure here which has no counterpart in the legislative history of America? If it be the province of Congress to deal with mobs, why was not its power turned upon the people of Cincinnati a few years ago when good order was subverted, and the foundations of society were shaken by a mob to a degree never known in any Southern State; where libraries were sacrificed, public records burned, and the blood of white citizens made to flow like water in the streets of the city.

How did the people of Chicago escape Senatorial investigation in the spring of 1886, when the mayor, in a public proclamation said there was—

The open defiance of the guardians of the peace by a body of lawless men who, under the pretense of aiding the laboring men, are really endeavoring to destroy all laws.

And where, according to the mayor—

These men by the use of weapons never resorted to in civilized lands, except in times of war or for revolutionary purposes, caused great bloodshed among citizens and the officers of the municipality who were engaged simply in the performance of their duties.

But, Mr. President, these monstrous crimes, and none such were ever known in any Southern State, were not committed upon negroes, and they can not, by any ingenuity, be associated with the political features of the negro question, and no fear can be plausibly pretended that possibly they may touch the exercise of the elective franchise and deprive the Republican party of votes which they assume to belong to them because they are negro votes. It is considerations like these which seem to impel some statesmen to discriminate between crimes in the North and South. This explains why they treat the violation of the negroes' rights of life and liberty as more to be condemned and more requiring the repressive action of the General Government than the violation of white mens' rights from the ordinary motives of criminals, and explains too why they utterly ignore the peculiar difficulties and embarrassments by which they know the Southern people are surrounded and from which their brethren of the North are wholly exempt.

Mr. President, the problem which confronts the Southern people is grave and serious enough to excite the sympathy and appeal to the patriotism of their fellow-citizens of the Northern States of every shade of political opinion. It is a problem full of doubts and difficulties and dangers, and it can never be solved or appreciated so long as the embarrassments which beset these people are overlooked or disregarded by those who would deal with the subject. It can not be solved through any of the agencies of mere partisan warfare. It is outside the domain of mere party politics, and what its solution is to be no statesman can safely foretell. But however and whenever the solution may come, it must be clear to all men that it can only be retarded and delayed if we persist in attributing to political differences and to these alone those results which are plainly due to race differences, though they may sometimes be developed in connection with elections.

This subject is engaging the attention of thoughtful and patriotic people everywhere, and they are tiring of the partisan treatment it has too long received and of the illiberality that has too often characterized its discussion.

I believe, sir, the people of this whole country—that the white people of the North, of whatever party, demand that there shall be no general condemnation here of the brethren of their own blood in the South without some consideration of their trying situation and their dangerous surroundings.

They know, as we know, that the present condition growing out of the relation of the races there is of necessity not in all things what they or we would have it; but they must realize that it is better than the world expected or had a right to expect it would become so soon. All who have impartially looked on while we have struggled with the grave race problem by which we are confronted, have seen the burdens we were bearing and the difficulties which beset us in establishing our new relations with a population of ignorant blacks who, having been our former slaves, suddenly, and without training or preparation, were not only set free amongst us, but set in power above the heads of their former owners, so far as a dominant political party could do this through any of the powerful agencies of the General Government.

I believe that the fair-minded people all over the country are now ready and able to appreciate and acknowledge the full difficulty of what we have had to do, and the full value of what we have done, and that they are now prepared to hold the great majority party of the North to a strict accountability for their action in connection with our affairs in past years when we were powerless in their hands. That this has not been so at an earlier day is largely owing to the passions and prejudices engendered by the war and afterwards kept alive by politicians to promote their own fortunes in public life.

But it has been partly due to the fact that people in those communities, where the whole population is of the same blood, the same habits of social life, occupying the same plane of civilization and intelligence, and with the same aims and aspirations, are slow to appreciate fully how vastly and painfully different the conditions are in communities composed of two distinct and in all respects widely dissimilar races. Both these obstacles to a fair consideration of Southern affairs are now in large measure removed, one by reaction and the lapse of time, the other by travel and communication between the sections and by free and friendly interchange of views and experiences between the people of those sections, by business identifications, by observation, reading, and reflection.

The white people of the South belong to the race that made this great country all that it is and will make it all that it is to be. No other race has ever stood before it or above it, and whether it be in this Republic or a subdivision of it, in a large community or a small one, no other race ever can or ever should.

This fact, accepted by all men as a fact, even though it may not justify, makes probable and unavoidable, and without reference to party causes is sufficient to account for, occasional disturbances and even collisions when there is the presence of another race in larger numbers upon the same theater of effort, especially when much of the training of the inferior race has been in the direction of distrust, suspicion, and hatred of the other.

The negro population of the South was brought among us as slaves from Africa when they were of the lowest order of humanity. At the end of a great war they were set free and invested not only with civil and political rights, but clothed also with political power, with no other fitness for such a change than they had gotten from a state of slavery. For years after the negroes were set free these two incongruous races with their diverse characters stood face to face in Mississippi, as in some other States, the blacks in the majority, backed up by Federal power and with all their teachings as to their newly acquired political rights coming from alien white leaders, whose mission seemed to be to poison their minds against the white Democracy, comprising then ninety-nine hundredths of the white people of the State.

These leaders, Republicans all, and most of them without character or standing in the States they hailed from, came among us to intensify the difficulties of our situation. The deluded blacks received them as missionaries from those who had set them free, and gave them their confidence, and by their votes, cast under the absolute dictation of these political adventurers, they made them the rulers of the State and placed them in all the positions of trust and profit within its limits. The government which these men, backed by their party here, gave to our helpless State was inefficient and corrupt in all its branches and in all its departments, wicked and wanton in its shameless disregard of every interest of every class, and degrading beyond expression to the white people, the only class within the State who had either the means or the intelligence to govern it.

After years of poverty and wretchedness, of humiliation and distress, added to four years of non-production and the waste of war, when the white people of the State had reached the very verge of despair, the wheel of political fortune turned and our alien and plundering rulers were hurled from the high places which they had disgraced. Since then, earnestly and honestly, temperately and discreetly as we could, we have been dealing with the perplexing problem before us, with its difficulties augmented and intensified by the evil teachings, the prejudices, and antagonisms planted in the minds of the blacks by their false friends and selfish leaders.

How far we have succeeded, while critics far removed from the scene have looked on to find fault; what progress we have made, while politicians for a purpose have denounced occasional disturbances arising from the contact of two incongruous races as the wrongful conduct of a whole community, let the growing prosperity of our State attest and the vastly improved and constantly improving condition of the relation of two races to each other.

The work we had to do could not be accomplished in a single decade, and it may require years to complete it. In fact the time may never come when these races will be so harmonious in all things and at all times that occasional interruptions of good order and even serious collisions may not arise out of the differences between them to which I have alluded.

Some thoughtful Republican statesmen have not failed to appreciate the difficulties of our situation. Several years ago in the discussion of a kindred question these difficulties were considered and acknowledged. Here is what Mr. Blaine said:

I supposed if there was any people in the world that had a race trouble on hand it was ourselves. I supposed if the admonition of our own history were anything to us we should regard the race trouble as the one thing to be dreaded and the one thing to be avoided. We are not through with it yet. It cost us a great many lives; it cost us a great many millions of treasure. Does any man feel that we are safely through with it now? Does any man here to-day assume that we have so entirely solved and satisfactorily settled on a permanent basis all the troubles growing out of the negro race trouble that we are prepared to invite another one? If so, he views history different from myself. If any gentleman looking into the future of this country sees, for certain sections of it at least, peace and good order and absolute freedom from any trouble growing out of race, he sees with more sanguine eyes than mine.

Mr. Booth, of California, in that discussion used these strong and striking expressions:

We do not establish the distinctions of races and we can not obliterate them even by the most solemn political declarations; the laws of physical nature can not be repealed even by acts of Congress.

* * * * * * *

As statesmen, looking before and after, we can not ignore the fact of race antipathies. No more difficult problem is ever encountered by any Government than the administration of a common system of laws over diverse races. It is a problem that is never peacefully solved. If the lessons of human experience are worth anything it never can be so solved.

* * * * * * *

The darkest pages of human history have been enacted when alien races have been brought in contact.

The distinguished Senator from Nevada [Mr. JONES], in a finished speech of great power, said:

The greatest war of modern times was the civil war of this country growing out of the existence here of two incongruous races, whites and blacks. The war was preceded by fifty years of controversy, always on the verge of open hostilities, concerning the proper relations which should exist between these races. It has been followed by fourteen years of divided counsels and excited passions as to the best method of reconstructing society and government where these races are intermixed. No satisfactory solution has yet been had, and it may be that another century will elapse before it is found.

The Senator last named treated lightly all "sentimental abstractions concerning the universal brotherhood of diverse races," and openly declared for his own race as better than any other.

The Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS], in the same discussion, in advancing the opinion—

That no republic can succeed that has not a homogeneous population—

Used these words:

That was what was for so long a time the curse of our Southern sister States. It was the want of homogeneity that they thought was mitigated and helped out by the fact that the different races occupied different positions—one dominant, the other servile. It did not accomplish it then, as they will all tell you now, Mr. President, and the one great evil there now is, not that the white man is better than the black man or the black man better than or equal to the white man, but it is that there has not yet been time enough, if ever there may be, that in the real and best sense of a homogeneous order in a republic these two people can assimilate and coalesce so as to make such a democratic state as I am speaking of.

But we have stronger expressions from other high Republican sources. Upon the matter of white and black races here is what Mr. Lincoln once deliberately declared and said he had done so before, and I beg the Senator from New Hampshire to put this by the side of the little slip he read last Thursday attributing to Judge Thurman many years ago somewhat similar sentiments which the Senator denounced:

There is a physical difference between the two which, in my judgment, will probably forbid their ever living together upon the footing of perfect equality, and inasmuch as it becomes a necessity that there must be a difference, I, as well as Judge Douglas, am in favor of the race to which I belong having the superior position.

* * * * * * *

I will say, then, that I am not nor ever have been in favor of bringing about in any way the social and political equality of the white and black races; that I am not or ever have been in favor of making voters or jurors of negroes, nor of qualifying them to hold office or to intermarry with white people; and I will say in addition to this that there is a physical difference between the white and black races which I believe will forever forbid the two races living together on terms of social and political equality. And inasmuch as they can not so live, while they do remain together there must be the position of superior and inferior, and I, as much as any other man, am in favor of having the superior position assigned to the white race.

Upon the views of Mr. Lincoln the honorable Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER], as late as the year 1882, in this chamber made this comment:

I understand that Mr. Lincoln never changed upon the question of the inferiority and superiority of the races; but when in the logic of events it became necessary, absolutely necessary in my judgment and in the judgment of other people, that this class of men, our intellectual and mental inferiors, should have protection at the hands of this Government, we determined that the only and proper way to protect them was to give them the advantages of citizenship in all its terms. It was not a desirable thing to do, and nobody knew it better than the great-hearted men who sat in the Senate and helped do it. There was not an intelligent American who looked upon that problem at the time who did not fear that the result would be that the antagonism of the two races would eventually swamp this country.

An earnest and able memorial was before the last Congress, prepared by Mr. John F. Swift, of San Francisco, whose high standing and excellent opportunities for justly judging the subject he was dealing with, give great weight to his words. I make the following extract touching what is termed in the memorial "The curse of race heterogeneity:"

Out of that evil we have had one bloody war for which the nation has not yet thrown off its mourning. But the war was nothing to what it left behind. It is true that it has settled the slave question. But the negro question, the question of the relations between the white man and the black man, and the relations of each to the State has only just begun. Twenty generations of men will not see it ended.

And our fellow-countrymen at the South who are compelled to carry on a government under such conditions, to preserve order and maintain law and civilized society, are entitled to the sympathy of all thoughtful people; they have a task, the difficulties of which are not appreciated.

The memorial proceeds:

We doubt if a genuine republican government, as we Americans understand the term, meaning a government in which all the people govern, participate equally, under the conditions existing in the South, namely, with one-third of the population of one race and two-thirds of another, is a practical possibility. One race will always dominate the other, and no power can prevent it, except by destroying the liberties of both. They can only be equal in a common servitude that overwhelms both.

And again:

One race may be the superior for one place, and not for another. We only say they can not live well or happily together, and ought not to be made to do it.

The statesmen who look for a change that is to harmonize the South, so that both races shall stand equal and be equal, have never lived in any mixed community, and know nothing about it. They know nothing of the hereditary and instinctive race antagonism, always latent in every individual human breast, and always springing into active vitality on bringing together two different races or types of men into the occupancy of the same territorial habitation.

Such statesmen overlook an unfailing human quality of instinct, and one too universal not to have a profound purpose in the general economy of nature.

I do not fully concur in all this. If one race must rule it will surely be the white race, and I believe the whites and blacks may live together in the South with the rights of both respected, but subject at intervals to those jars which race causes inevitably produce.

Even this result, however, must come slowly if those who are honestly striving to accomplish what many think impossible are publicly denounced by leading statesmen of the country for those interruptions, which are sometimes due alone to the inconsiderate action of a few persons surrounded by peculiar circumstances, and sometimes to the commonest instincts of self-protection, whether in an individual or a community.

That these two races are not assimulative and that there are irreconcilable diversities of character from which disturbances must come when they live as equals in the same locality, however much the great mass of both races may deprecate it, and that the white race must have the superior position, seems to have been the orthodox Republican opinion, never questioned or disputed until for political reasons it became expedient to impose it on the Southern people, in seeming defiance of the laws of nature, to obliterate the distinctions of races. So far as this pertains to matters political, and so far as it is possible and proper, and further than many of the most sanguine and enthusiastic philanthropists and abolitionists of the North ever expected, this has been and is now being accomplished in Mississippi by the white Democrats of that State, and with no more strife or disturbance than grows unfortunately but directly and unavoidably out of race antagonisms.

The South is not the only section of this country where race antipathies have engendered serious trouble, and have even led to horrid deeds of blood, and the Southern people are not the only people living under this Government who have been visited by the calamities growing out of race diversities. We of the South have not been alone in our struggle with a great race problem, nor do we stand unsupported in our instinctive desire and in the purpose, so far as in us lies, that the Christian civilization of the white race of this Republic shall not be sacrificed in any section. This is no mere Southern sentiment, no mere interested Southern policy. It is, I believe, the plainly recorded will of the American people, when that will has asserted itself free from the influences which former slavery at the South has exercised upon the discussion of the question and relieved from the party consequences attached to its solution in that section.

The State of California, a great State of unlimited resources, peopled by a vigorous race, representing the brain and energy of every section of the Union, had to meet this question. The opportunities to acquire fortune which that State presented, attracted the harmless and docile Chinese to its shores, a race of people which, with all its defects, is far superior to the negro in cultivation and intelligence. They rapidly increased in numbers, and in a few years were in competition with the white labor of that country. They had no concern in parties or in politics and were invested with no civil and political privileges.

But by patience, humility, and industry they crowded the white man in fields of labor which hitherto had been all his own, and as their numbers increased they became a distinct body in that region, different in habits, repugnant in morals and adverse to those prejudices of our own race most easily excited.

The people of the Pacific coast became excited and indignant and hostile; but the Chinese had come under the guaranty of a treaty, to keep which we were bound by all the obligations of national honor. But the people of that coast appealed to their Government, and those in authority recognized that their first duty was the preservation of the Christian civilization of their own race; a mission was sent to China, and China consented to a modification of the treaty under which her people had come to our shores, and the immigration of Chinese laborers was forbidden. But while this very negotiation was pending the race feeling on the Pacific coast found expression in scenes of violence which have no parallel in the collisions between the whites and blacks of the South.

In Colorado the outburst of popular sentiment was such that a riotous assault was made upon a peaceful Chinese settlement, life was taken, homes were burnt and property destroyed by a mob numbering over five thousand, which for more than eight hours kept up its lawless work.

In the Chinese minister's communication to the Secretary of State, dated January 21, 1881, he says:

The Chinese residents who were subjected to the wanton outrage of the mob came to this country under the right of treaties between China and the General Government of the United States, and not with Colorado or any individual State.

* * * * * * *

He says further:

I beg to call your attention to the following verdict of the coroner's jury:

"The evidence shows that the said mob could have been suppressed by the regular force had they fearlessly arrested the ringleaders, but which, owing to the disorganized condition of the police force of the city and the incompetency and inefficiency of its government by the proper authority and the failure of the county authorities to render the necessary aid and assistance required in such emergencies, the mob assumed such proportions as culminated in the destruction of human life and the disgrace of the city in not affording protection to life and property."

This verdict shows clearly that the local authorities had not brought into requisition all the means for the suppression of the mob.

Where was the spirit of Senatorial indignation and investigation then? We heard of no Federal inquest bill at that time nor of any kindred measure. Does it happen that Colorado was not a Southern State? Was it because the Chinaman was not a voter? Was it less infamous to murder and abuse a man protected by a treaty made in pursuance of a constitution than to kill a citizen protected by a constitution? However that may be, when the Chinese appealed to the only Government they knew in this country, declaring that they had come under the faith of a solemn treaty with this great nation and not with Colorado or any other State, what was Secretary Evarts's reply?

I will read you an extract:

As to the arrest and punishment of the guilty persons who composed the mob at Denver, I need only remind you that the powers of direct intervention on the part of this Government are limited by the Constitution of the United States. Under the limitations of that instrument the Government of the Federal Union can not interfere in regard to the administration or execution of the municipal laws of a State of the Union, except under circumstances expressly provided for in the Constitution. Such instances are confined to the case of a State whose power is found inadequate to the enforcement of its municipal laws and the maintenance of its sovereign authority; and even then the Federal authority can only be brought into operation in the particular State, in response to a formal request from the proper political authority of the State.

This sound declaration of constitutional law came from the acknowledged head of the American bar, then Secretary of State and now a distinguished Senator in this body, who has joined in the report of the majority upon the municipal election at Jackson, Miss. The American people who recognize his great powers might well, I submit, be informed how this wholesome doctrine can be reconciled with the idea that the Federal Senate or the Federal Government can invade a State's authority and take charge of the matter of a town election for the purpose of ascertaining whether it was lawfully conducted.

And the Secretary adds, what is not inapplicable to some deeds of violence for which the South has been roundly denounced:

It seems superfluous to recall to your attention the fact, but too well attested by history, that on occasions, happily infrequent, often without motive in their inception, and always without reason in their working, lawless persons will band together and make up a force in the character of a mob of sufficient power and numerical strength to defy, for the moment, the denunciations of the law and the power of the local authorities. Such incidents are peculiar to no country. Neither the United States nor China are exempt from such disasters.

I have not referred to this case in order to force a strained analogy, but because it enables me to show the difference in the standpoint from which we look at the same question.

But, sir, bloodier race-collisions have occurred elsewhere in the West. Why, in the very month of March, 1886, when the Senator from Massachusetts introduced his Federal inquest bill, which he said was "suggested by the reports of the recent occurrences at Carrollton, Miss.," when there had been no opportunity for investigation, but he was proceeding on mere newspaper reports, as he admitted, there was lying on his table or within his reach a special message from the President of the United States calling the attention of Congress a second time to a massacre of people of color at Rock Springs, in Wyoming Territory, where Congress has powers which it has not in any State, to which the most exaggerated representation of any Southern tragedy offers no parallel.

In his first annual message the President had adverted to—

The recent outbreak in Wyoming Territory, where numbers of unoffending Chinamen, indisputably within the protection of the treaties and the laws, were murdered by a mob; and the still more recent threatened outbreak of the same character in Washington Territory.

And had said that—

All the power of this Government should be exerted to maintain the amplest good faith toward China in the treatment of these men, and the inflexible sternness of the law in bringing the wrongdoers to justice should be insisted on.

In this special message, dated March 2, 1886, he called attention to what he had said in his annual message, and said:

The facts, which so far are not controverted or affected by any exculpatory or mitigating testimony, show the murder of a number of Chinese subjects in September last, at Rock Springs, the wounding of many others, and the spoliation of the property of all when the unhappy survivors had been driven from their habitations. There is no allegation that the victims, by any lawless or disorderly act on their part, contributed to bring about a collision. On the contrary, it appears that the law-abiding disposition of these people, who were sojourners in our midst under the sanction of hospitality and express treaty obligations, was made the pretext for the attack upon them. This outrage upon law and treaty engagements was committed by a lawless mob.

He further said:

The note of the Chinese minister, and the documents which accompanied it, give, as I believe, an unexaggerated statement of the lamentable incident, and present, impressively, the regrettable circumstance that the proceedings, in the name of justice, for the ascertainment of the crime and fixing the responsibility therefor, were a ghastly mockery of justice.

And he called attention to "the palpable and discreditable failure of the authorities of Wyoming Territory to bring to justice the guilty parties."

From the "unexaggerated statement" of the Chinese minister I call attention to the following extracts:

It appears that several hundred subjects of his Imperial Majesty the Emperor of China, having entered the territory of the United States in accordance with treaty stipulations, had located themselves at Rock Springs, in the Federal Territory of Wyoming; had there erected houses, and for a number of years past had been engaged in the lawful pursuits of peaceful industry. On the 2d of September last these subjects, while quietly engaged in their usual avocations, were suddenly attacked, without any provocation on their part, by a lawless band of armed men, said to have numbered about one hundred and fifty persons. With scarcely any warning the Chinese were ordered by the mob to leave their homes, but before an opportunity was afforded them to execute these orders a deadly fire of musketry was opened upon them, and they were compelled to abandon their houses and all their property and flee to the mountains for their lives.

In a short space of time all who were able had fled without offering any resistance, many of them being shot while in their homes or as they ran away from them. Fire was then set by the rioters to their houses, and the entire village, which constituted their chief place of abode, and all Chinese habitations outside the town of Rock Springs, were burned to the ground. As a result of the mob, twenty-eight Chinese were killed, fifteen more or less severely wounded, and a large amount of property (estimated at $147,748.74) was destroyed or appropriated by the rioters.

* * * * * * *

A second fact shown is, that the events occurred "in broad daylight." One of the witnesses says, "I think nearly all the murderers can be identified, as no concealment was attempted, * * * but all done in daylight." It does not appear that any civil or other authorities made any attempt to prevent or suppress the riot. The judicial proceedings which followed the sad event are described as "a burlesque." The conduct of the coroner who investigated the causes of death seems to me strange, but with my imperfect knowlege of American procedure I prefer not to criticise it.

A further fact is stated by the consul at San Francisco. He says, "I am, after thorough investigation, firmly of the opinion that not one of these criminals who murdered the Chinese, burned and robbed them at Rock Springs, will or can ever be brought to punishment by the so-called Territorial or local authorities. In this opinion I am sustained not only by my own convictions, but also by the governor and prosecuting attorney of the Territory, and scores of citizens, residents and non-residents." This opinion would seem from subsequent events to have been well founded, as, according to the reports in the public press, all of those who had been arrested for participating in the riot have been released, and the grand jury of the county has refused to find any bills of indictment.

* * * * * * *

In the first place, I desire to submit to the enlightened judgment of your excellency whether the present case is not, in one material respect, different from the occurrence at Denver, Colo. In the latter Mr. Evarts called attention to the fact "that the powers of direct intervention on the part of this Government are limited by the Constitution of the United States. Under the limitations of that instrument, the Government of the Federal Union can not interfere in regard to the administration or execution of the municipal laws of a State of the Union, except under circumstances expressly provided for in the Constitution." And after referring to those circumstances as applied to the Denver riot, he concluded that action "belongs exclusively to the government and authorities of the State of Colorado." But in the present case, if I have been correctly informed as to the governmental practice of your excellency's nation, the administration of justice and the protection of life and property belong exclusively to the Government and authorities of the Federal Union, and the limitations referred to, as hampering the immediate and direct intervention of the supreme Government in the Denver case, do not obstruct the action requested in this note.

Yet, sir, with these official papers before him, showing the murder of twenty-eight unoffending and law-abiding Chinese, when, as the President said, there was—

No allegation that the victims by any lawless or disorderly act on their part contributed to bring about a collision.

Showing that the—proceedings in the name of justice for the ascertainment of the crime and fixing the responsibility therefor were a ghastly mockery of justice, going to show, as the Chinese minister said, that the guilty parties might have been identified as no concealment was attempted, and calling attention as he did to the fact that this crime was committed in a Territory where the control of the administration of justice by the General Government was not hampered by the constitutional restraints which Secretary Evarts had said, as to the Colorado riot, prevented Federal interference.

In regard to the administration or execution of the municipal laws of a State of the Union.

With all this fresh before the honorable Senator from Massachusetts it required "reports of recent occurrences at Carrollton, Miss.," to suggest to him a Federal measure for the protection of the lives of people in a State who are not of the white race. I have shown in discussing the Colorado riot that when the question of the relation between an inferior and superior race came before the American people, free from the disturbing element of former slavery, they decided deliberately that under no circumstances should the superior race be permitted to be endangered; that even the material prosperity of the white laboring man should not be threatened even by honest competition, when that cheap competition forced the white laborer to a lower plane of moral and intellectual life, and that the safety of the country forbade the degradation of its free white Christian civilization; and this has been emphasized by later action with which we are familiar.

Does the old element of slavery make any difference in the solution of the question as presented at the South? Whether it does or not there has been a wide difference between what has been done for the negro by those who formerly held him in servitude and those to whom he is mainly indebted for his freedom.

You who set him free must remember that the war delivered him to you as much of an alien as the Chinaman. You made him a citizen by an act as arbitrary and absolute as if you had made the Chinese citizens by a summary sweeping act of naturalization. You forced the negro, all unprepared, into politics as an element to be used for party purposes, and you left to us all the danger, all the difficulty, and all the responsibility growing out of the presence of this element in our midst. You gave him the ballot, but left the Southerner to feed him and clothe him and employ him.

Ours has been the constant contact with him and the constant liability to conflict arising from that contact; it has been yours to judge us harshly; to criticise and condemn as we have contended with the hard problem you gave us to solve. While the solution has been progressing, race disturbances have sometimes occurred as the result of race prejudice, and, as I have already said, they are liable to occur in the future, in spite of our efforts to prevent them. Still, the substantial advancement the negro has made in our midst and with our means shows how we have dealt with him and with the difficult question arising out of his relation to us and to the State.

In the twenty years and more since the negro has been free he has prospered wonderfully in the South. As a rule, when left free from external influences, he has done well. Bad men in the past, for political advantage, have sometimes excited his prejudices and his passions, and arrayed him against his white neighbors. But still it is a fact that while there have been serious interruptions in particular localities under peculiar conditions, the two races in Mississippi, as elsewhere in the South, have in general approached each other somewhat in a spirit of mutual concession and are tending towards harmonious co-operation in promoting the happiness, prosperity, and progress of the whole community.

If the movement succeeds the peril of race antagonism may possibly disappear. According to the assertions of some prominent persons, especially those living outside the State, it is not likely to succeed in Mississippi, but some cheering evidences to the contrary come to us from trustworthy citizens of both colors in that State. In this connection I desire to read an extract from an address delivered not very long ago by the most prominent and prosperous colored planter of Mississippi, who was once a slave.

At Vicksburg, on the 11th day of November, 1886, Mr. Isaiah T. Montgomery, as president of the Mississippi Colored Fair Association, in the presence of a large concourse of people, including the governor and other officers of the State, county, and city, as well as many leading business men, opened the exercises of the fair of 1886 with an address, in which he said:

> The object and intent of this association is to arouse the pride of our race in the product of their labors by bringing them into competition with each other and stimulate their dormant energies to the production of greater excellence in every avenue of life. And I wish here to make a public acknowledgment of the active sympathy, earnest counsel, and material aid afforded, and to other similar enterprises by the white people of all classes. I believe that their actions in these instances have, better than any words, given an answer to the vexed problem of the future of the two races in the South.
> Owing to unfortunate political differences grave fears have existed of a growing estrangement between them. Politics is a sentiment often deceitful and misleading in its tendencies; but what we have before us to-day is a truth and reality. By reference to our catalogue and supplemental list it will be observed that the subscriptions to our premium list in merchandise amount to near $650, and in cash to near $600, making a total of about $1,250. About 99 per cent. of this was subscribed by white people, and the amount could have been largely increased but for the limited time.
> We have as our guests honored representatives of our city and county governments and the distinguished chief magistrate of the State, Governor Robert Lowry, and a number of other prominent gentlemen. Besides, we have numerous letters containing profound regrets for non-attendance and words of goodwill and encouragement from eminent statesmen, jurists, clergymen, and representatives.
> Would this material aid be proffered, would these distinguished honors be conferred by enemies? No sane man can contend that they would be. Like the sunlight struggling through the mist and fog of the morning, the truth dawns upon us that we are friends for the future as we have been in the past; that together the two races will replenish our worn lands, hew down the boundless forests, and uncover the virgin soil to extend our triumphs in agriculture, manufacturing, and in the arts and sciences. Together they will rebuild our fallen fortunes and make our fair Southland in reality, what nature has endowed it to be—the fairest heritage of mankind.
> Ladies and gentlemen, in conclusion and on behalf of the association I thank you for your kind attendance here to-day. I thank the citizens of our city and county for their liberal assistance. I thank the press of the State, of the South generally, of Vicksburg in particular, for invaluable encouragement.

The speaker then introduced the Democratic governor of the State, who had been selected by the colored people as the orator of the day.

Other addresses in like tone and temper, delivered on similar occasions, at other times, by prominent colored Republicans, might be produced, but as they have been widely published it is not necessary.

If Senators with whom the condition of affairs as affecting the negro in Mississippi is the object of such especial interest would but go into that State, where the Democrats have been in power for twelve years and more, and see for themselves, as I trust some day they may be induced to do, I promise them they would find much there which they would heartily commend.

They would learn something of the trials of a people whose misfortune it has been for more than twenty years to have to deal with a stupendous problem arising out of the friction of two races which the world knows are not homogeneous. They would see much to deplore in the presence of an ever-threatening danger from the contact of these incongruous races, augmented by the fact that the inferior one is sometimes misguided by the leadership of the worst elements of the other. They would see the election laws and other laws sometimes broken there as elsewhere, criminals sometimes unpunished there as in other States of the Union, and the natural prejudices and antipathies of race producing their natural results there as in other quarters of the country; but in the main they would see the laws observed and enforced there as in their own States. They would see black men sitting on juries with white men and sharing in the administration of the laws. They would see schools for both races supported by the self-imposed taxes of the whites.

They would find that more than half of a large school fund, of which the negroes paid less than one-tenth, has been expended for the benefit of colored children, and more than 3,000 colored teachers employed in the State and in many cases receiving higher salaries than white teachers. They would find the negro absolutely secure in all his property rights and the courts dispensing justice with an even hand to both races and all classes. They would learn that the black man sits in the State Legislature and that white legislators earnestly co-operate with him in making laws for the interest and protection of his race. They would see a whole population busy in honest and energetic work, with scarcely a man among them not earning a support, and would find the black population secure in the wages for their labor.

They would hear of no strikes by the agricultural laborer there to show either discontent or oppression; but they would find the relations between the negro and his white employer better adjusted and more satisfactory to both than the relations are between employer and employé in any locality on the continent outside the South. They would find a material development in the common work of the white and black races, steady in its growth, despite the occasional outbreaks which race prejudice produces in particular localities, and utterly irreconcilable with the theory that the body of the white race is oppressing the body of the black race. In all these—in the school-houses and in the houses of worship, in the temples of justice, in the legislative halls, in the fields and in the factories—they would see and hear the testimony of the daily life of the State and witness the results of twelve years of white rule under Democratic auspices.

Look at Mississippi as it is to-day, and then look back to what it was when its government was in the hands of the Republican party. Take the year of 1870, when the control of that party there was absolute and unrestrained, and behold the contrast between the despondency of the people, the blight and depression which rested on every interest and paralyzed every energy then, and the signs of reviving hopes, the prosperity and progress which are now observable all over that State. Agriculture is the leading pursuit of the people there and as evidence of their present thrift I need only point to the fact that their corn crop last year was more than double that of 1870, and that in 1870 their cotton crop amounted to less than six hundred thousand bales against nearly a million and a quarter in 1887.

More than a thousand miles of railroad have been constructed in that State since 1876, traversing the finest timber forests on the continent and the richest agricultural lands in the world, and other important lines are now in process of construction. We have some manufacturing establishments, and they are every day increasing both in prosperity and numbers. In some sections of the State crops are now being considerably diversified, in some the lumber trade has of late years become very extensive and very profitable, and in others canning and creamery establishments, fruit-growing and market-gardening, stock-raising and the like are among our most remunerative industries.

The labor system, which had been wholly disorganized and unsettled, is every year becoming more adapted and better adjusted to those conditions which promise the best results to all interests and all classes. Our lands, which under the burdens of oppressive taxation imposed by our former rulers could not be considered the basis of any reasonable credit, now, since those burdens have been lightened under Democratic rule, bear a market value approximating their real worth and are eagerly sought after by those who live beyond our borders. In 1870, and during all the dismal years before and afterwards of Republican misrule in Mississippi, our fertile soil, mild climate, and the quality and variety of our boundless timber supply failed to tempt investors to put their money in that State or settlers to cast in their lots with the fortunes of our people; but this is true no longer since intelligent, home-born citizens, identified with the best interests of the State, are controlling its destinies.

In 1870 there were less than two thousand teachers employed in the public schools in Mississippi, while last year there were more than six thousand, and half of these, or more, teaching the children of colored parents who contributed but a trifling proportion to the fund from which these teachers received their compensation. Taxation has been reduced, property is secure, the public institutions of the State are flourishing, the relations between the races more satisfactory and beneficial to both than they could ever have become under the government that formerly cursed the State. The evidences of improvement and prosperity are to be seen on every hand and the work of progress and development is steadily advancing.

Travelers from the North who have visited that State will attest the truth of this, and Northern investers and settlers who have gone there to improve their fortunes, whether they be Republicans or Democrats, will tell you that it would be a crime by any means, or under any law, to wrest the control of public affair s in Mississippi or any other Southern State, even if it could be done, from the hands of the only class who have the interest or the capacity to conduct them efficiently and honestly.

When we consider the social disturbances, the grinding taxation, the shameless disregard of public interest or private right, the official infidelity and reckless waste which marked the administration of the government in Mississippi during the years to which I have alluded, and then turn to the marvelous improvement which has since then been wrought under Democratic rule, in all interests, and in the condition of all classes of the people, and all in the face of the p eculiar difficulties and dangers to which the incongruities of race exposed them, I do not believe there is a Senator who hears me, whatever his politics, or wherever his home, who would see that great and growing Commonwealth remanded to the awful state from which it has emerged under Democratic guidance and control.

I do not believe there is a Senator here who would not, if he lived in that State, put forth all his powers to avert the horrors of black supremacy, and save his own people if he could from the calamities of such a curse. And I do not believe there is a white community in any Northern State who, if in our condition, would tamely and meekly submit to a reign of ignorance and venality under which honorable white men of intelligence and substance would be excluded from all the high places of official trust in the State, and all the possessions and most sacred interests of their race brought under the rule of uneducated, undisciplined, and irresponsible negroes. I pray I may not live to see the day when such a fate shall befall the people among whom my whole life has been spent, and on my faith in them I confidently build the hope that such a direful day can never come.

ADMISSION OF WASHINGTON.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumes the consideration of the unfinished business, being the bill (S. 12) to provide for the formation and admission into the Union of the State of Washington, and for other purposes.

J. W. PORTER.

Mr. COCKRELL. Several days ago on my motion the bill (H. R. 4792) to pension J. W. Porter, which had been passed by the Senate, was recalled from the House of Representatives and returned to the Senate. I ask that the vote by which the bill was passed may be reconsidered for the purpose of having it recommitted to the Committee on Pensions.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The votes by which the bill was passed and ordered to a third reading will be reconsidered, by unanimous consent, and the bill recommitted to the Committee on Pensions. It is so ordered.

BENJAMIN T. BAKER.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 2825) granting a pension to Benjamin T. Baker; which was, in line 6, before the word "dollars," to strike out "seventy-two" and insert "fifty;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Benjamin T. Baker, late a seaman in the United States Navy, and pay him at the rate of $50 per month, in lieu of that which he is now receiving.

Mr. BLAIR. I move that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House of Representatives.

The motion was agreed to.

A bill (H. R. 10907) granting a pension to Henry Mitchell Youngblood;

A bill (H. R. 10944) granting a pension to Victoria May;

A bill (H. R. 11029) for the relief of Mary Vanbuskirk; and

A bill (H. R. 11030) granting a pension to Susan E. Latture.

The following bills were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Claims:

A bill (H. R. 5349) for the relief of James Trabue, Thornton Thatcher, Michael Callahan, and the widow of John Waters; and

A bill (H. R. 5888) for the relief of W. H. Boyd.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT SIOUX CITY, IOWA—VETO MESSAGE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was read:

To the Senate:

I return without approval Senate bill No. 288, entitled "An act for the erection of a public building at Sioux City, Iowa."

On the 19th day of June, 1886, I was constrained to disapprove a bill embracing the same subject covered by the bill herewith returned. Further investigation on the second presentation of the matter fails to convince me that $150,000 should be expended at present for the erection of a public building at Sioux City.

From all the representations that are made in an effort to show the necessity for this building, I gather that the only two purposes for which the Government should furnish quarters at this place are a term of the United States court not specially crowded with business, and the post-office, which, though perhaps crowded, I am sure can get on very well for a time without a larger public building.

As far as the court is concerned, it was agreed when a term was located there in 1882 that it might be held in the county building, which, from the description furnished me, seems to be entirely adequate for the purpose and very well arranged. The term held in October, 1887, was in session for nine days.

I am decidedly of the opinion that if a public building is to be located at Sioux City, it better be delayed until a better judgment can be formed of its future necessity and proper size.

I see some of the parties interested have such confidence in the growth and coming needs of the place, that in their opinion the work ought not to be entered upon with a less appropriation than $500,000.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, Washington, August 27, 1888.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, Shall the bill pass notwithstanding the objections of the President of the United States?

Mr. ALLISON. I am constrained to move that the bill and message be referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

The motion was agreed to.

AMENDMENT TO APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HAMPTON submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the general deficiency appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Claims and ordered to be printed.

Mr. STEWART. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 6 o'clock and 25 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, August 28, 1888, at 12 o'clock m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, August 27, 1888.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by Rev. J. H. CUTHBERT, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday was read and approved.

WILLIAM F. HUDSON.

Mr. WEAVER. I ask unanimous consent to submit for present consideration the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk. Mr. William F. Hudson, the distributing clerk of the House, died suddenly on Saturday, and I ask leave to have the usual resolution in such cases considered.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay out of the contingent fund of the House to —— Hudson, father of William F. Hudson, deceased, late distributing clerk of the House, a sum equal to six months' salary as such clerk, and also the expenses attending his last illness and funeral, not to exceed the sum of $250.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. WEAVER moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

WILLIAM H. BOYD.

Mr. RYAN. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 5888) for the relief of William H. Boyd, and that it be considered by the House at this time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas asks that the Committee of the Whole House be discharged from the further consideration of the bill he has named. The bill will be read, after which the Chair will ask for objections.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to W. H. Boyd, late a commissioned captain of the Eleventh Regiment of United States Colored Troops, the full pay and allowances of a captain, from March 4, 1864, to October 20, 1864, less any moneys that may have been paid him by the United States for services rendered during that time.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? The Chair hears none.

Mr. ALLEN, of Mississippi. Let us have the report read.

The report (by Mr. BROWER) was read, as follows:

The Committee on War Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 5888) for the relief of W. H. Boyd, have considered the same, and submit the following report:

It appears from the records of the War Department that W. H. Boyd was promoted from quartermaster-sergeant in Second Kansas Battery to captain in the Eleventh United States Colored Troops by Special Orders, No. 90, War Department; and February 24, 1864, was mustered out of the said service as such sergeant to accept such promotion in accordance with the order, of which the following is a copy:

"ADJUTANT-GENERAL'S OFFICE, Washington, February 24, 1864.

"SIR: I forward herewith your appointment of captain in the Eleventh Regiment of United States Colored Troops, your receipt and acceptance of which please acknowledge without delay, reporting at the same time your age and residence when appointed, the State where born, and your full name correctly written. Fill up, subscribe, and return as soon as possible the accompanying oath, duly and carefully executed. You will report in person for duty to Maj. Gen. J. G. Blunt, United States Volunteers, Fort Smith, Ark.

"I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

"C. W. FOSTER,
"Assistant Adjutant-General."

Thereupon he complied with the terms of said order, and was, on the 15th of April next following, assigned to detached duty by order of General Blunt. The following is a copy of the order:

"[Special Order No. 51.]

"HEADQUARTERS RECRUITING COMMISSION,
"Fort Smith, Ark., April 15, 1864.

"Capt. W. H. Boyd, Eleventh Regiment United States Colored Troops, is hereby assigned to the recruiting duty, and will, on receipt hereof, immediately proceed to Fort Scott, Kans., for the purpose of recruiting for said regiment.

"II. On arriving at Fort Scott, Capt. W. H. Boyd will report to Col. Charles W. Blair, commanding post at Fort Scott.

"By command of Maj. Gen. J. G. Blunt.

"Lieut. Col. FRED. W. SCHAUSTE,
"Superintendent in Charge of Recruiting,
"Eleventh United States Colored Troops."

This order he obeyed at once, and he remained on such detached duty until ordered to report to the commandant of the fort at Mound City, Kans., for duty in the field. This order he promptly obeyed, and was at once assigned to the command of a company of irregular troops pressed into service by Major-General Curtis to resist the invasion of the State by the Confederate General Price. He remained on this duty until after the forces of Price had been driven from the State. His regiment having been consolidated with another, he was finally honorably discharged from the service on the 20th day of October, 1864.

He was denied all pay and bounty as a sergeant after his muster-out for promotion, and because of such muster-out. He was never mustered or paid under his commission as captain, because he was not with his command, but was on detached service. He was denied muster under the provisions of the act of June, 1881, because his command did not have the requisite number of troops.

Your committee are of the opinion that Boyd should be paid the full pay and allowance as a captain from the time of promotion to that position, to wit, March 4, 1864, to the time of his discharge from the service, to wit, the 20th day of October, 1864, that being the time he was on actual duty under his commission as captain.

Your committee therefore recommend that the bill pass.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? The Chair hears none.

Mr. CANNON. I see the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BYNUM] is in his seat——

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman from Illinois suspend for a moment. There is a bill under consideration.

Mr. CANNON. I understand that, and I rise to debate it.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Is the bill debatable?

The SPEAKER. Unanimous consent has been given for the consideration of the bill.

Mr. CANNON. I will take the floor for a few moments, and I do it for the purpose of calling attention to the remarks of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BYNUM], made in the House on the 20th instant and telegraphed through the country, and inserted in the RECORD of the 26th. He says in his remarks:

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] rushes to the defense of his brother Benjamin, and it is highly proper that he should do so. There is an appropriateness in their companionship. It is a trite but true saying "that birds of a feather flock together." The gentleman from Illinois is a worthy champion of the record of General Harrison, his own record being akin to that of his candidate for the Presidency. I am of the opinion, however, that it will keep the gentleman busy this campaign to take care of his own record.

In the Forty-sixth Congress Mr. Goode, a Democrat of Virginia, on April 21, 1879, offered a joint resolution (H. Res. 9) to provide for the enforcement of the eight-hour law. On the 7th of May a member of the Committee on Education and Labor reported the resolution to the House with a favorable recommendation.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] opposed the passage of the resolution. In reply to a question whether the last proclamation of President Grant did not declare that there should be no reduction in the wages of workmen employed by the Government of the United States on account of a reduction of the hours of labor he said:

"I do not now recollect, but it is not material; the fact is, the law as now executed is this: if they work ten hours they get ten hours' pay, and if they only work eight hours they only get eight hours' pay. In other words, they only get pay for what they earn. That is, the law is now being executed, and, so far as I am concerned, it will go on in that way, proclamation or no proclamation."

On motion of Mr. CANNON, the resolution was laid on the table, yeas 127, nays 90. Among those voting with the gentleman from Illinois are the following distinguished Republicans: BAYNE of Pennsylvania, BURROWS of Michigan, HISCOCK of New York, MCKINLEY of Ohio, REED of Maine, and Levi P. Morton of New York. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Then there is an arraignment of the Republican party, in which he says, among other things:

They refused to execute the eight-hour law and defeated the resolution favoring its enforcement.

Now the gentleman finds this record, as he thinks—or as he does not think, for I believe I am justified in saying the latter—and parades it here because of the statement it contains that Mr. Morton, the present candidate for the Vice-Presidency upon the Republican ticket, voted as the gentleman has indicated. So far as my own record is concerned I am ready to take care of it, and I would not have called attention at this time to the remarks of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BYNUM] were it not that his statement is exactly contrary to the fact so far as Mr. Morton is concerned. I have in my hand the Journal record of the vote to which the gentleman referred, first session Forty-sixth Congress, May 8, 1879. If the gentleman consulted the RECORD he should have consulted the Journal also, and if he had done so he would have found that instead of 127 there were only 126 yeas on that vote and 90 nays. Mr. Morton, along with sixty-nine others, not voting.

Again the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BYNUM] arraigns the Republican party for laying this resolution upon the table. Mr. Speaker, at that time the Democratic party had almost two-thirds of this House, and it had a majority of eight in the Senate, and the resolution when it failed failed in a Democratic House and a Democratic Congress. But the gentleman takes great care in his statement not only to misrepresent Mr. Morton, but also not to speak of the vote upon the same resolution in the second session of the same Congress. In the second session of that Congress, the Forty-sixth Congress, the same resolution was passed under a suspension of the rules, by a vote of—yeas 130, nays 51, and amongst those voting in the affirmative is found the name of Mr. Levi P. Morton. (See Journal, second session Forty-sixth Congress, pages 1490 and 1491, June 14, 1880.)

In stating the result of the first vote the gentleman from Indiana mentioned the name of certain Republicans, but he carefully omitted to mention the names of a large number of Democrats who voted the same way, amongst them Mr. BLOUNT, Mr. Clark, Mr. CULBERSON, Mr. FORNEY, Mr. Hammond, Mr. John T. Harris, Mr. Miles, Mr. MILLS, Mr. Morrison, Mr. REAGAN, Mr. Sparks, and many others.

Now, I repeat that I have not risen on this occasion for the purpose of discussing the merits of this proposition. I will take care of my record whenever I think it is necessary, and I only ask the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BYNUM] to do as I do, at least in one particular. I ask that when he undertakes to take care of his record or to attack the record of other men, he will produce the record as it is and not state it exactly contrary to the fact.

Reserving my time, I yield the floor for the present.

Mr. BYNUM. If the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] will examine the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, volume 37, Forty-sixth Congress, first session, page 1161, he will find the following proceedings:

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the vote just taken—

That is, upon the motion to lay the resolution upon the table.

Mr. COX called for the yeas and nays.
The yeas and nays were ordered, there being—ayes 38, noes 126.
Mr. RICE. I would like the Chair to state the question on which we are about to vote.
The SPEAKER. The question is upon laying upon the table the motion to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution and amendment were laid on the table.
Mr. COX. Those in favor of the joint resolution will vote no.
The SPEAKER. And those who want to kill the proposition will vote ay.
The question was taken; and there were—ayes 127, noes 90—

And among those recorded as voting in the affirmative is Levi P. Morton, of New York, and Mr. CANNON, of Illinois.

That is the record upon which I made my statement.

Mr. CANNON. Does not the gentleman know that the daily CONGRESSIONAL RECORD is not the highest evidence in a matter of that kind? [Jeering laughter on the Democratic side.]

Mr. BYNUM. The RECORD is made daily and laid before members every morning, and they examine it with reference to their votes, and they never see them as they are recorded in the Journal.

Mr. CANNON. Allow me to state that the Journals of the House speak the action of the House; and I ask the gentleman now if he did not quote Mr. Morton from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD as voting in a certain way, knowing that the Journal showed the contrary? Will the gentleman answer that question? [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. BYNUM. I say to the gentleman that I took this vote from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, and found it there just as I gave it; I examined no further. I was not aware that there was any variance between the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and the Journal until the gentleman mentioned it just now, or I would have so stated when I first announced Mr. Morton's vote. I believe, however, Mr. Speaker, the RECORD to be correct. Mr. Morton was present, as the roll-calls show, on the 6th of May; they do not show that he was given any leave of absence on the 6th, 7th, or 8th, or that he was paired on this vote. I believe the RECORD to be the best evidence of who voted and how they voted. The yeas and nays in the RECORD are published the next morning in the RECORD of the previous day's proceedings—the vote as published from the original roll-call—while the Journal is not published till the end of the session. The vote as published is taken from a copy of the original. The principle that a copy can not be used so long as the original is at hand is as old as the common law itself. Of course the Journals of the House are official records and as such are evidence of the facts contained, but as a matter of fact the votes recorded in them are but copies, while the RECORD contains the original.

Mr. CANNON. Here is the Journal. I will show it to the gentleman, and I ask the gentleman again if he did not know that the Journal showed to the contrary of his statement?

Mr. BYNUM. Does the Journal show the yea-and-nay vote? [Cries on the Republican side of "Answer!" "Make him answer!"]

Mr. CANNON. It shows the yea-and-nay vote. Here it is.

Mr. BYNUM. Does the gentleman say that the vote on the motion to lay the resolution on the table is recorded in the Journal?

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman answer my question?

Mr. BYNUM. I say to the gentleman that the yeas and nays were not taken on the motion to lay the resolution on the table. They were taken on the motion to reconsider the vote. The RECORD shows that there was no yea-and-nay vote on the motion to lay on the table.

Mr. CANNON. Here is the Journal, and it shows not the 127 ayes as the gentleman stated, but 126, and Mr. Morton's name is not recorded as voting as the gentleman stated he voted.

Mr. BYNUM. Mr. Speaker, I say that the yeas and nays were not upon his motion to lay the resolution upon the table, but upon the motion to lay the vote to reconsider upon the table. While I am up I desire to call the attention of the House to a statement made in the RECORD——

Mr. CANNON. Oh, no, let us settle one thing at a time.

Mr. BYNUM. Oh, I have settled that to the satisfaction of the gentleman, I think; and when he comes here and attempts to contradict the RECORD with the Journal of the House, it is a question as to which is the best evidence of the fact. [Jeers on the Republican side.]

The SPEAKER. The House will be in order.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman has not answered, and I do not believe he will answer that he did not know what the Journal showed.

Mr. BYNUM. I have stated to the gentleman that I did not examine the Journal, that I examined the RECORD only, and that I did not know that there was any variance between the Journal and the RECORD.

A MEMBER on the Republican side. That is not the question.

Mr. BYNUM. Here is McPherson's Handbook of Politics, publishing that same vote. This is an official record, so far as the Republican party is concerned; and upon this question Mr. Morton is reported in favor of laying the resolution on the table—the same as in the RECORD.

Mr. CANNON. That is McPherson's Handbook of what year?

Mr. BYNUM. Eighteen hundred and eighty.

Mr. CANNON. What page?

Mr. BYNUM. Page 178.

Mr. CANNON. Ah, the gentleman is now speaking of a vote taken the next session, the second session, of that Congress, when this same proposition was brought up; when Mr. Morton voted to suspend the rules and pass the resolution. He voted "ay." I have that Journal here and McPherson's Handbook, and they agree. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. BYNUM. The gentleman is correct, I notice from a closer examination of the book which has just been handed me. Now, I desire to call the gentleman's attention to the record. The Journal which the gentleman reads from, I see, shows Mr. Morton as absent and not voting.

Mr. CANNON. That is what I have said.

Mr. BYNUM. I have not examined as to whether it is the same vote or not.

Mr. CANNON. Oh, yes; it is the same vote.

Mr. BYNUM. I have not, of course, had time to examine whether Mr. Morton was present on that day or not; but I will examine the records as to that fact. In the RECORD he is recorded as present and voting; he is not reported as being absent—showing conclusively to my mind that the RECORD is correct on this point. In the Journal he is recorded as being absent on that day and not voting at all.

As I have said, every member of the House sees a copy of the RECORD on the morning of its publication; and every member, so far as my knowledge goes, looks over the votes and corrects any vote if he is misrepresented or misrecorded. The Journal is never looked at by any member until after the session, because it is not published until then. While it may be an official record, I say to the gentleman it is not as good a record of the action of this House as the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD is. Another thing to which I wish to call the gentleman's attention is the fact that the names of members voting on any question are never read when the Journal is read each morning. The space is a blank, and is never filled till the record goes to the Printing Office.

So far as this matter is concerned, there seems to be some conflict between the Journal and the RECORD. If there is any way to ascertain which is correct, I shall do so. I would like to know how this variance can be accounted for. That is all I have to say on that point at present.

I notice in the remarks of the gentleman from Nevada [Mr. WOODBURN] the statement that the contract-labor law was repealed by the Forty-seventh Congress, not by the Forty-eighth Congress. The gentleman did not make that statement on the floor of the House, or I should have corrected him at that time. I can only attribute this statement of the gentleman to the fact that he was overzealous in trying to obscure the facts in reference to the matter. But it is a fact that the contract-labor act was repealed in the Forty-eighth Congress—not in the Forty-seventh.

Now, the gentleman from Illinois can not excuse himself before his constituents because he may have had some good company on the occasion referred to. The gentleman must answer to his constituents for his own vote; and Mr. Morton must answer for his vote; and every other leading Republican must answer to his constituents for his vote. It is not sufficient for the gentleman to come here and say that Democrats voted with him on that occasion.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I desire again to say that the gentleman's statement touching the vote of Mr. Morton is not true. It falsifies the record.

The statement that it so appears in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD is mere pettifogging. The Journal of the House shows the action of the House, and shows, as I have stated, that Mr. Morton was not present, was not voting, and did not vote.

Again: I state at the next session, the second session of the Forty-sixth Congress, as shown by the Journal which I have in my hand, the motion was made to suspend the rules and pass this same eight-hour resolution, and it received 130 votes—yeas 130, nays 51, not voting 111, and amongst the 130 votes voting yea in that same Congress is the name of Levi P. Morton. [Applause on the Republican side.] There is the Journal.

Now the gentleman says I can not creep out by trying to associate with respectable men like BLOUNT and Morrison on his side of the House to justify my action by theirs. I have not tried to do so. I am responsible for my votes without reference to anybody. I have defended this vote and successfully before the working people and farmers of my country and my district, and I will do so again or I will go to the wall. But I will never do it by rising in my place in this House or out of this House and misstating the record, and especially when it is brought to my knowledge, by then rising and pettifogging instead of rising in my place and acknowledging my mistake and begging the country's pardon and Mr. Morton's pardon for misstatement of the record. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. BYNUM. Do I understand the gentleman to say that I have misstated the record of Congress?

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

Mr. BYNUM (holding up the RECORD). Here is the RECORD, and the gentleman can not show it. I dare him to do it.

I will ask the gentleman another question. Have you ever examined the votes of the Journals of Congress to see whether you are recorded correctly or not? [Derisive laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. CANNON. I always examine the votes as recorded upon the Journal of the House when a vote is called in question, and when I am seeking to find out how any gentleman is recorded, because it is notorious the vote recorded in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD is often erroneous, and the Journal shows the true vote. No man who is careful of his own rights and the rights of other members will make a statement as to a vote in a former Congress without examining the Journal.

Mr. BYNUM. So far as the Journal shows the vote one way and the RECORD another the member at the time seeks to make the correction, and it may have been changed in that way.

Mr. CANNON. The CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of this morning has an error of the print which covers one hundred and fifty names.

A MEMBER. Sunday morning's RECORD?

Mr. CANNON. Yes; Sunday morning's RECORD, which has been corrected by an order of the House.

Mr. BYNUM. Have you examined the Journal to find out as to your vote?

Mr. CANNON. The Journal is not printed and laid on our tables, while the RECORD is laid upon our desks every morning.

Mr. BYNUM. Certainly it is; and that is just what I have been contending; and that the RECORD is corrected as it is published, while no one ever has an opportunity to see the votes as recorded in the Journal until the session is ended.

Mr. RYAN. I think the merits of the bill have been made quite clear by the discussion [laughter], and therefore I call for the previous question.

The previous question was ordered, and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. RYAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

JAMES TRABUE ET AL.

Mr. ROGERS. I ask for unanimous consent to discharge the Committee of the Whole House from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 5349) for the relief of James Trabue, Thornton Thatcher, Michael Callahan, and the widow of John Waters, and put it upon its passage.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read, subject to the right of objection.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to the several persons in this act named the several sums hereinafter stated, the same to be in full settlement of the claims of said parties for use and occupation of property by the United States, namely:

To James Trabue, $600.
To Thornton Thatcher, $93.33.
To Michael Callahan, $113.66.
To the widow of John Waters, $1,825.

Mr. HOLMAN. Let the report be read.

The report (by Mr. STONE, of Kentucky) was read, as follows:

The facts out of which this bill for relief arises will be found stated in House Report No. 3959, of the Committee on War Claims of the Forty-ninth Congress, a copy of which is hereto appended and made a part of this report.

Your committee adopt the said report as their own, and report back the bill and recommend its passage.

[House Report No. 3959, Forty-ninth Congress, second session.]

The Committee on War Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 311) for the relief of James Trabue et al., have carefuliy examined the same, and find the facts to be as stated in Senate Report No. 29, Forty-ninth Congress, first session, which report is hereto annexed and made a part of this report, and is as follows:

[Senate Report No. 29, Forty-ninth Congress, first session.]

We adopt the report hereto annexed, made by Mr. GEORGE, from this committee, in the first session of the Forty-eighth Congress, and recommend the passage of the bill.

The Committee on Claims make the following report on this bill:

CLAIM OF MR. CALLAHAN.

This claim was before this committee at the second session of the Forty-fifth Congress. We adopt their report, which is as follows:

"The claimant presents five certified quartermaster's vouchers for rent of property at Huntsville, Ala., during the months of August, September, October, and November, 1864, and January, February, March, April, May, June, August, September, November, and December, 1865, amounting to $113.66.

"The following is written on the face of the vouchers for the months prior to August 1, 1865:

"'To be settled hereafter as the Government may direct, the claimant being considered loyal.'

"The accounting officers of the Treasury rejected this claim on the ground that it was among those prohibited to be paid by them under the act of Congress of February 21, 1867.

"These claims were reported by the depot quartermaster at Huntsville, Ala., as being due, and were so borne upon their accounts.

"They were referred by the Third Auditor of the Treasury to the Quartermaster-General, by whom they were examined and found to be correct. In certifying the claims back to the accounting officers of the Treasury, the Quartermaster-General says: 'Payment is not conditional on proof of loyalty. The services have been reported to this office as required by the regulations.'

"In this case the loyalty of the claimant is vouched for on the face of each certificate given him during the period of hostilities, and it is not to be presumed that the officers of the Army would improperly or heedlessly give such a certificate to a disloyal person.

"Your committee recommend that the claim be allowed, and report as a substitute for the bill referred to them (S. 271) the following bill, and recommend its passage."

CLAIM OF T. THATCHER.

The committee find the following facts in relation to the claim of Thornton Thatcher embraced in the same bill:

That Capt. James P. Day of the Thirty-seventh Illinois Infantry, and assistant quartermaster of the post at Columbus, Tex., rented a house from the claimant for $53.33. The house was occupied and used for storing quartermaster and commissary supplies in November and December, 1865. The said Day gave regular vouchers therefor in due form, and reported the same to the proper Department.

The claim was disallowed by the Quartermaster-General and the Treasury Department solely on the ground that payment of it was prohibited by the Treasury Department, by section 300 B, of the Revised Statutes. This statute, however, has not been recognized or held to be an annulment of contracts of rent duly made, and claims of that sort have been uniformly paid by Congress. This claimant also presents a demand for $40 for rent at same place in August, 1865. The contract in this case was made by J. M. Culbertson, first lieutenant of Thirty-seventh Illinois Infantry, acting assistant quartermaster at this post, who gave a regular voucher for the same. This is in all respects like the former. The whole claim for $93.33 is just.

CLAIM OF JAMES TRABUE.

This claim was first presented in the name of W. B. Gosa, admintstrator of W. P. Grace.

It appears that the claim belonged to James Trabue, who gave it for collection to Gosa, who died, and his administrator claimed payment. The claim is now presented in the name of the true and original owner. It was reported on by the committee at the second session of the Forty-fifth Congress (Report No. 178). We adopt the report, which is as follows:

"W. P. Grace, administrator for W. B. Gosa, presents six certified vouchers of Army quartermasters for rent of property at Pine Bluff, Ark., during the months of September, October, November, and December, 1865, and January and February, 1866, stated at $100 each.

"Letters of administration to W. P. Grace accompany the vouchers.

"It appears from the accompanying papers that the accounting officers of the Treasury were prohibited from paying these vouchers by the act of Congress of February 21, 1867.

"By an indorsement on the face of some of the vouchers it appears that the store-house of the claimant had been taken possession of for Army purposes in August, 1864, without a contract of lease. The quartermaster of the post at Pine Bluff, Ark., issued regular vouchers, monthly, for the rent of the property, in the years 1865 and 1866, which were approved by the officer commanding the post and the accounts were duly reported to the Quartermaster-General, as appears by his indorsement on the papers.

"The building was used for offices and warehouses for the Subsistence Department of the Army at that post. No valid objection to the claim appears, and it is sufficiently established by the vouchers given to the claimant.

"Your committee report the accompanying substitute for the bill (S. 271) referred to them, and recommend its passage."

CLAIM OF JOHN WATERS.

This claim was before the committee at the second session of Forty-fifth Congress, and a favorable report thereon made. We adopt the report, which is as follows:

"Capt. A. W. Wills, who was assistant quartermaster of the Army, stationed at Memphis, Tenn., gave to John Waters two certificates on Form 22, for the rent of a dwelling, No. 15, on North College street, in that city. The first is dated December 31, 1863, and is for the rent of said house from June 1 to December 31, 1863, at $75 per month. The other is dated January 31, 1865, and is for the rent of the same house from the 1st of January, 1864, at $100 per month, the amount of said certificates being $1,825. On the face of each certificate is the following indorsement: 'Payable hereafter as the Government may direct.'

"These vouchers passed through the office of the Quartermaster-General and the offices of the Third Auditor and Comptroller of the Treasury, and were found correct, but payment was refused because the officers of the Treasury Department were prevented by the act of Congress of February 21, 1867, from settling and paying such claims when they originated in States lately in rebellion.

"The loyalty of John Waters is very clearly established. There is no reason to suppose that this dwelling-house was seized or taken possession of by the Army of the United States as captured or abandoned property. To the contrary, the certificates given him by the quartermaster indicate a lease by agreement, and he returned the property, as having been leased by him, in his reports to the Quartermaster-General's Office. The rate per month of the rental was stated in the certificates. Nothing was left open, but that the payment should be made as the Government might direct.

"Your committee are of the opinion that it is the duty of the Government to pay the debt according to the agreement as shown in the certificates of the quartermaster, and accordingly report the accompanying substitute for the bill referred to them (S. 271), and recommend its passage."

The above and the two other reports herein copied were made by the committee through Senator MORGAN, of Alabama.

It appears now that Waters is dead, and that this claim has been set apart by the proper court to his widow, as her right in his estate. The bill should be amended so as to require payment to her.

The committee find all the claims just, and recommend the passage of the bill, after it is amended by inserting in line 14, after the word "to," the words "the widow of."

The committee therefore adopt said Senate report as the report of this committee, and recommend that the accompanying bill do pass.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. ALLEN, of Michigan. I would like to ask the gentleman this question before consent is given, why all of these cases are bunched together in one bill? The parties appear to be widely separated as to territory, and, if I understood the reading of the report aright, some of them at least, as far as the question of loyalty is concerned, are not vouched for. I do not want to object to the consideration of the bill if I can help it——

Mr. ROGERS. My colleague, Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, is much more familiar with the facts than I am. I will answer the gentleman's question as to the last-named party in the bill, Mrs. Williams, now Mrs. Waters, that she was at that time a resident of Nashville, Tenn., but has since married Williams and now lives in Arkansas. He can explain better than I can.

Mr. ALLEN, of Michigan. I can shorten this matter if the gentleman from Arkansas will permit me to ask a question as to whether the loyalty of these parties is proven?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. Unquestionably; and that is stated very fully, if the gentleman had been able to hear the reading of the entire report.

Mr. ALLEN, of Michigan. I could not hear the reading of the whole report.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. Bills for the relief of these parties have been passed three or four times by the House and by the Senate, but it happened that there was not concurrent action upon them in the same Congress, arising from one cause or another.

Mr. ALLEN, of Michigan. I have no objection to the consideration of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the bill will be before the House for consideration.

There was no objection.

Mr. ROGERS. I send to the desk an amendment to be submitted to the bill in conformity to the report of the committee.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that is already embodied in the bill. The report in the Forty-ninth Congress recommends an amendment, which appears to be embodied in the bill.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. The Chair will observe that there is a slight change in the amendment. This lady has been married since that report was made.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment of the gentleman from Arkansas.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out "the," in line 14, and insert in lieu thereof the words "Annie M. Williams, late;" and insert after the words "John Waters," in the same line, the word "deceased;" so that it will read: "to Annie M. Williams, late widow of John Waters, deceased."

The amendment was adopted.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. ROGERS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SARAH L. LARIMER.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to discharge the Committee of the Whole House from the further consideration of the bill (S. 2563) to compensate Mrs. Sarah L. Larimer for important services rendered the military authorities in 1864 at Deer Creek Station, Wyo., and for loss of property taken by Sioux Indians.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read subject to the right of objection.

The bill was read at length.

Mr. KILGORE. I demand the regular order.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I hope the gentleman will allow this bill to pass.

Mr. KILGORE. I insist upon the demand for the regular order.

Mr WILLIAMS. Will the gentleman not allow me a brief explanation?

Mr. BLAND. I think we had better have the regular order.

Mr. WILLIAMS. This is a good bill.

Mr. BLAND. It is a bad bill to begin with, but a good bill to demand the regular order to commence with.

EXPLANATION.

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, I believe the matter which I ask to submit to the Chair is one of privilege. By the RECORD of yesterday morning it appears that my colleague [Mr. RICE] is absent without leave of the House. I will state that he had leave of absence, and that he is away from the House in consequence of sickness in his family.

The SPEAKER. The correction will be made.

The Chair will state in this connection that it seems to be the practice in the publication of the official record of the proceedings of the House to state opposite the names of absent members called during the call of the House that no excuse is offered; and this statement is made frequently in connection with the names of gentlemen not only who have leave of absence, but those who are absent by order of the House. The Chair suggests to the Journal Clerk that if he can furnish to the Official Reporters of the proceedings a list of the members absent with leave or by order of the House this apparent injustice could be avoided, and the Chair will endeavor hereafter to see that this is done.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, indefinite leave of absence was granted to Mr. HUNTER on account of ill health.

WITHDRAWAL OF A BILL.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HEARD] asks to have the following resolution passed, to recall a bill from the President, which seems to be necessary.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the President of the United States be requested to return to the House the bill of the House No. 10060, prescribing the time for sales and notice of time of sales of property in the District of Columbia for overdue taxes.

Mr. HEARD. On behalf of the Committee on the District of Columbia, the chairman of which is temporarily absent, I ask at the request of the District commissioners immediate action on this resolution, because it is necessary that the Senate should also act upon it to-day as the time within which it must be disposed of by the President expires to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. HEARD. I would state that the object of this bill being to amend the law of the District of Columbia relating to the advertisement and sale of property for delinquent taxes, its recall is desired in order that certain dates therein may be changed so as to harmonize its provisions with those parts of the existing law which it is intended to perfect.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection the resolution will be considered as agreed to.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. HEARD moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has received a number of telegrams from members of the House offering excuses for their absence, and asking to have their leave extended. If there be no objection, the Chair will lay these telegrams before the House. Some of them are sent from members who are sick, and some are from those who have sickness in their families. The Clerk will read them.

The Clerk read as follows:

WILLIAMSBURGH, KY., August 27, 1888.

To Hon. J. G. CARLISLE,
Speaker House of Representatives, Washington:

My family has typhoid fever. Can not be in city for some time.

H. F. FINLEY.
E. S. MOSS, M. D.

The SPEAKER. This telegram is signed by the gentleman himself and also by his family physician.

Is there objection to his being excused? The Chair hears none.

A MEMBER. The resolution of the House does not apply to these cases.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has not had opportunity to consult the resolution, but was of the opinion that leaves of absence were revoked of members who are not sick.

Mr. JACKSON. The resolution only excuses members for sickness.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thought it better to lay them before the House. The resolution of the House does not embrace those who were excused on account of sickness at the time, but the Chair is unable to ascertain without examination of the record who were excused on that account.

Mr. WEAVER. But where the sickness has terminated, the excuse ought not to be given.

The Clerk read as follows:

POLAND SPRINGS, ME., August 27, 1888.

JOHN LEEDOM,
Sergeant-at-Arms House of Representatives:

Can not come this week; am under care of physician and must remain. Have me excused.

JNO. A. McSHANE.

Mr. MACDONALD. Is it proper now to ask that Mr. McSHANE be excused?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. MACDONALD. Then I ask that Mr. McSHANE be excused.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

WHITE HOUSE, New Jersey, August 27, 1888.

To J. P. LEEDOM:

Am unwell; can not come to-day. Will as soon as I am able. Try and pair me or get me excused. Answer.

J. N. PIDCOCK.

Mr. CRISP. I move that Mr. PIDCOCK be excused.

Mr. TRACEY. Does Mr. PIDCOCK ask to be excused on account of sickness?

The SPEAKER. He says he is not well.

Mr. WEAVER. I would like to have the telegram read again.

The telegram was again read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to Mr. PIDCOCK being excused?
There was no objection.
The Clerk read as follows:

GAINESVILLE, Ga., August 27, 1888.

Hon. J. P. LEEDOM, Washington, D. C.:

My daughter is critically ill. I can not leave her. I ask an extension of leave of absence.

A. D. CANDLER.

Mr. CRISP. I ask that Mr. CANDLER be excused.
The SPEAKER. Is there objection?
There was no objection.
Mr. CRISP. Is the understanding that it is indefinite leave?
The SPEAKER. It is.
The Clerk read as follows:

UTICA, N. Y., August 27, 1888.

J. P. LEEDOM,
Sergeant-at-Arms:

Very serious sickness in my family renders immediate return impossible.

J. S. SHERMAN.

Mr. MCCORMICK. I ask that Mr. SHERMAN be excused.
There was no objection.
The Clerk read as follows:

ONEONTA, N. Y., August 27, 1888.

The SERGEANT-AT-ARMS,
House of Representatives:

Am not well enough to come to Washington.

DAVID WILBER, M. C.

Mr. TRACEY. I ask that Mr. WILBER be excused.
There was no objection.
The Clerk read as follows:

ARLINGTON, MD., August 27, 1888.

J. P. LEEDOM,
House of Representatives:

Am not well; procure me leave of absence for few days.

I. RAYNER.

Mr. RUSK. I ask that my colleague, Mr. RAYNER, be excused.
There was no objection.
The Clerk read as follows:

ERIE, PA., August 27, 1888.

J. P. LEEDOM,
Sergeant-at-Arms, House of Representatives:

Notice received. Will return to Washington soon as sickness in my family will permit.

W. L. SCOTT.

Mr. MAISH. I ask that Mr. SCOTT be excused.
There was no objection.
The Clerk read as follows:

CANAAN, CONN., August 27, 1888.

Hon. J. P. LEEDOM,
Sergeant-at-Arms, House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

Dispatch just received. Not able to go. Reasons by mail.

M. T. GRANGER.

Mr. ROCKWELL. I ask that my friend Judge GRANGER be excused. I know that he is ill and I have paired with him.
There was no objection.
The Clerk read as follows:

MANHATTAN BEACH, CONEY ISLAND, N. Y., August 25, 1888.

J. D. O'CONNOR,
Clerk Census Committee, House of Representatives:

Really too unwell to be in Washington Monday. Have written.

S. S. COX.

Mr. BACON. I ask indefinite leave of absence for my colleague, Mr. COX. I have seen a letter from him, and he states that his physician says it is impossible for him to come to Washington.
There was no objection.
The Clerk read as follows:

LOGANSPORT, IND., August 27, 1888.

Hon. J. P. LEEDOM,
Sergeant-at-Arms, House of Representatives:

I asked leave of absence on account of serious illness in my family. Wired Mr. CHEADLE Tuesday requesting such leave. Answer if presence is ordered.

W. D. OWEN.

Mr. CHEADLE. I asked, as I thought at the time, indefinite leave of absence for Mr. OWEN, but I am told that the sickness did not appear of record. I ask that he be now given indefinite leave of absence.
There was no objection.
The Clerk read as follows:

BURKEVILLE, VA., August 27, 1888.

Col. J. P. LEEDOM,
Sergeant-at-Arms, House of Representatives:

Telegram received; convalescent; can not leave home for ten days; extension.

W. E. GAINES.

Mr. J. R. BROWNE. I ask that Mr. GAINES have the leave he requests.
There was no objection.
The Clerk read as follows:

MOUNT VERNON, OHIO, August 27, 1888.

Hon. A. C. THOMPSON,
House of Representatives:

Colonel COOPER is home sick under my care as his physician.

J. W. RUSSELL, M. D.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I ask that Mr. COOPER be excused.
There was no objection.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. I do not object to the granting of these leaves of absence, but, as we are excusing everybody, would it be in order to move to rescind the resolution which was carried on Saturday last after a great deal of passionate rhetoric?
The SPEAKER. That would be in order.
Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. It seems that the leaves of our absent colleagues are so universal that that would really be the effect of it.
Several MEMBERS. Regular order.
Mr. SPRINGER. Over one hundred and thirty telegrams were sent to members, and these are a few from whom responses have been received.
Mr. WEAVER. I think it would appear from these telegrams that Washington is a much healthier place than any other part of the country, therefore it would be in order to revoke the leaves of absence granted to our sick brothers, and ask them to come back here where they can be restored to health.
Mr. MCCREARY. I understand that the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE] made no motion revoking the order of last Saturday. I hope nothing of that kind will be done. It is very important that we should have a quorum here this week.
The SPEAKER. The gentleman did not make a motion of that character. The Clerk will proceed with the reading of the telegrams.
The Clerk read as follows:

NEW BERNE, N. C., August 27, 1888.

JOHN S. HENDERSON,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

Have telegram Sergeant-Arms. My wife very ill. Can not come. Exempt me from resolution.

F. M. SIMMONS.

Mr. CRISP. I ask that the gentleman be excused.
There was no objection.
Mr. LYNCH. The RECORD does not show that I was present when the roll was called on Saturday. I was present and answered to my name.
The SPEAKER. A correction of the RECORD has been ordered.
Mr. CRISP. I received a letter this morning from Mr. BLANCHARD, of Louisiana. That gentleman is now in the city and has been here all the time. He has been quite sick for ten days and confined to his room. He desired this statement to be made; and I request that he be granted indefinite leave of absence from the House.
There was no objection.
Mr. MAISH. I have not noticed that any excuse or telegram has been received from Mr. RICE, of Minnesota. It has come to my knowledge that he was called home in consequence of the death of a daughter, and I therefore ask that he be excused.
The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. WILSON] does not know whether his colleague was excused or not.
Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. My colleague was excused before he left, and it was not on account of sickness but death in his family.
The SPEAKER. Then the RECORD does not show it.
Mr. MACDONALD. I move that he be excused indefinitely. He was excused on account of sickness in his family, and since then his daughter has died.
There was no objection.
Mr. MATSON. My colleague [Mr. HOWARD] was granted leave of absence some days since because of the critical illness of his daughter. I think his leave, which was for ten days, has expired. I know that he would return here but for his daughter's illness, and I ask that he be excused.
There was no objection, it was so ordered.
Mr. MAISH. Mr. Speaker, does it appear that my colleague [Mr. RANDALL] has been excused on account of sickness?
The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] was excused some time ago on account of sickness.
Mr. STOCKDALE. I find that in the list of members answering on the roll-call on Saturday my name is not recorded. I answered every time the roll was called.
The SPEAKER. The correction will be made.
A MEMBER. Regular order.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is demanded. The regular order is the call of States and Territories for the introduction of bills and resolutions.

EXPENDITURES IN THE TREASURY DEPARTMENT.

Mr. WHEELER offered the following resolution; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Rules:

Resolved, That Thursday, August 30, and Saturday, September 1, be set apart for the consideration of bills reported from Committee on Expenditures in the Treasury Department.

CLAIMS OF THE CREEK INDIANS.

Mr. COBB introduced a bill (H. R. 11271) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to investigate certain claims of the Creek Nation of Indians; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

CHANGES IN THE TARIFF LAWS.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas, introduced a bill (H. R. 11272) to correct certain abuses arising under the present tariff laws relating to iron and steel railway bars; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas, also introduced a bill (H. R. 11273) to correct certain abuses arising under the present tariff laws relating to copper; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas, also introduced a bill (H. R. 11274) to correct certain abuses arising under the present tariff laws relating to structural iron; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas, also introduced a bill (H. R. 11275) to correct certain abuses arising under the present tariff laws relating to lumber; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas, also introduced a bill (H. R. 11276) to suspend the operation of laws relating to the sinking fund and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BAYNE. Mr. Speaker, to what committee are these bills referred?

The SPEAKER. To the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. BAYNE. I should not think that that would be a proper reference of these bills. The Committee on Ways and Means have already reported a bill affecting matters coming under the tariff laws, and therefore to refer these bills to that committee does not strike me as the best way of securing action upon them.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. The bill to which the gentleman refers, which was reported by the Committee on Ways and Means and passed by the House, does relate to the duty on lumber, and one of the bills just referred embraces the same subject, and like provisions, but the indications are that the bill which passed the House will not be very sedulously pushed in the Senate.

Mr. BAYNE. Do I understand my friend from Arkansas [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE] to agree that the bill reported from the Committee on Ways and Means, generally called "the Mills bill," requires modification and correction?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. Not in the particulars referred to, and I am not suggesting any modification.

Mr. BAYNE. In any particular?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. As I stated to the gentleman before——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read clause 2 of Rule XI.

The Clerk read as follows:

All proposed legislation shall be referred to the committees named in the preceding rule, as follows:

Subjects relating to the revenue and the bonded debt of the United States to the Committee on Ways and Means.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. This last bill relates to the bonded debt of the United States, and should therefore under the rule be referred to the Committee on Ways and Means. The Clerk will proceed with the call.

Mr. VANDEVER introduced a bill (H. R. 11277) to provide means to exterminate the cottony cushion scale now threatening the destruction of citrus-fruit culture in California; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Agriculture, and ordered to be printed.

BRIDGES OVER NAVIGABLE STREAMS.

Mr. DAVIDSON, of Florida (by request), introduced a bill (H. R. 11278) to prohibit bridges over navigable streams, bays, and harbors of the United States without the consent of Congress; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

BANKS HOLDING GOVERNMENT MONEY WITHOUT INTEREST.

Mr. MASON offered a resolution to investigate certain national banks which hold and use Government money without interest, and to ascertain how much, if anything, is contributed by said banks for the use of said money to the Democratic national campaign committee; which was read and referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

AMENDMENT OF RULES.

Mr. HOLMAN introduced the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Rules and ordered to be printed in the RECORD.

Resolved, That the Rules of the House be amended as follows:

Rule X, clause 1, so that line 6 thereof will read as follows: "the Committee on Appropriations to consist of nineteen members."

Rule XI, so that clauses from 3 to 16 thereof, inclusive, will read as follows:

3. to appropriation of the revenue for the support of the Government: to the Committee on Appropriations.

4. to judicial proceedings, civil and criminal law: to the Committee on the Judiciary.

5. to banking and currency: to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

6. to coinage, weights, and measures: to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures.

7. to commerce, life-saving stations, and light-houses, other than appropriations for Life-Saving Service and light-houses: to the Committee on Commerce.

8. to the improvement of rivers and harbors: to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

9. to the merchant marine and fisheries: to the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries.

10. to agriculture and forestry: to the Committee on Agriculture.

11. to the relation of the United States with foreign nations: to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

12. to the military establishment and the public defense: to the Committee on Military Affairs.

13. to the naval establishment: to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

14. to the post-office and post-roads: to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

15. to the lands of the United States: to the Committee on Public Lands.

16. to the relations of the United States with the Indians and the Indian tribes: to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

PUNISHMENT OF TRUSTS.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Iowa, introduced a bill (H. R. 11279) to define "trusts," and to provide for the punishment of persons connected with them or carrying them on, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

INTERNATIONAL CONFERENCE OF RED CROSS ASSOCIATION.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky, introduced the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That there be printed 5,000 copies of Senate Executive Document No. 231, first session, Fiftieth Congress, being letter of the Secretary of State transmitting a report of the fourth international conference of the Red Cross Association, and the report transmitted; said copies for the use of, and to be delivered to, the president of the American National Association of the Red Cross.

CANAL COMMUNICATION WITH CANADA.

Mr. DAVIS introduced the following resolution; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested, if not in his judgment incompatible with the public interest, to communicate to the House copies of all communications, if any, addressed by his direction to the Government of Great Britain, remonstrating with that Government against the wrongs and unfair treatment of our citizens by the action of the Canadian Government in refunding to vessels and cargoes which pass through the Welland Canal and other Canadian canals nearly the entire tolls, if they are destined to Canadian ports, while those bound for American ports are not allowed any such advantage, and the breach of the engagement contained in the treaty of 1871, whereby Great Britain promised to the United States equality in the matter of such canal transportation; also copies of any demand made by his direction upon Great Britain for the redress of such wrongs, and the replies of Great Britain to such communication and demand.

MONUMENT TO JOHN ANTHONY QUITMAN.

Mr. STOCKDALE introduced a bill (H. R. 11273) to erect a monument in the State of Mississippi to the memory of John Anthony Quitman; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Library, and ordered to be printed.

CONSIDERATION OF BUSINESS FROM LABOR COMMITTEE.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri, introduced the following resolution; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Rules:

Resolved, That Wednesday, September 5, after the reading of the Journal, be set apart for the consideration of bills and resolutions reported from the Committee on Labor.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. I wish to make a parliamentary inquiry. The Committee on Rules have, I believe, the right to report at any time?

The SPEAKER. They have.

REDUCTION OF LETTER POSTAGE.

Mr. BUCHANAN introduced a bill (H. R. 11280) to reduce letter postage to 1 cent per ounce; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed.

STATUE OF PÈRE MARQUETTE.

Mr. THOMAS, of Wisconsin, introduced a joint resolution (H. Res. 217) authorizing the State of Wisconsin to place in Statuary Hall at the Capitol the statue of Père Marquette; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Library, and ordered to be printed.

PROTECTION OF SETTLERS ON MAXWELL LAND GRANT.

Mr. JOSEPHS introduced a joint resolution (H. Res. 218) for the protection of the actual settlers upon the Maxwell land grant, in the Territory of New Mexico and the State of Colorado; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. JOSEPHS called for the reading of the joint resolution; which was read, as follows:

Whereas, by virtue of the decision made by the Secretary of the Interior on the 31st day of December, 1869, all the land lying and being situate in the Territory of New Mexico and the State of Colorado, and within the limits of what is now known as the Maxwell land grant, was opened to settlement; and

Whereas, by reason of said order, individuals have occupied portions of said grant, believing in good faith that the same was a part of the public domain of the country, and have made improvements thereon and sought to acquire the same for homestead and pre-emption purposes, in accordance with the land laws of the United States; and

Whereas it has been decided by the Supreme Court of the United States that said Maxwell land grant has been no part of the public domain since the act of Congress in reference thereto, of the 21st day of June, 1860: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, directed to forthwith examine into the occupancy of the Maxwell land grant by those who hold adversely to the party or parties in whom the title thereto has been decided to be by the Supreme Court of the United States, and to report to Congress without unnecessary delay the extent of each adverse holding, the value of the land embraced within such holding, and also the value of the improvements upon said holding, and also the time at which said holding was first occupied, and also the name or names of the party or parties who now possess the same, with the view to indemnify such adverse claimants for the expenditures which they have incurred in good faith.

And be it resolved further, That during the pendency of such investigation and of the report thereon to Congress, all writs of ejectment be, and they are hereby, temporarily suspended.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. FORNEY. I present a conference report upon the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the sundry civil appropriation bill. I ask that the report (together with the accompanying statement as an appendix to the report) be printed and that it lie over.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. FORNEY] submits a conference report on the sundry civil appropriation bill, and asks that the report, together with the statement of the managers on the part of the House, be printed and lie over.

Mr. FORNEY. I do not think it necessary to have it printed in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman desires to have it printed in document form?

Mr. FORNEY. Yes, sir.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that the report and accompanying statement be printed and lie over for the present. Is there objection to this request? The Chair hears none; and it is so ordered.

PROTECTION OF SETTLERS ON MAXWELL GRANT.

Mr. SAYERS. I ask, by unanimous consent, that the Committee on Private Land Claims have leave to report at any time on the resolution referred to it on motion of the gentleman from New Mexico [Mr. JOSEPH], as it involves a matter of great importance.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. This being the fourth Monday, it has been set apart by the rules for the consideration of bills reported by the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. HEARD. I am authorized to state in behalf of the Committee on the District of Columbia that, owing to the absence of several members of the committee, and in view also of the important general legislation demanding attention at this time, that committee will not claim to-day for the consideration of District business.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BURNES. Is it in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. BURNES. I make that motion, with a view of resuming the consideration of general appropriation bills.

The SPEAKER. The rule of the House adopted at the present session provides that the second and fourth Mondays, after the call of States, shall be set apart for the consideration of certain business as may be presented by the Committee on the District of Columbia. Under that rule, if Monday is claimed for that committee, of course there is no hour for the call of committees; but not being claimed, there is a morning hour for the call of committees, unless it is dispensed with.

Mr. BURNES. I move that it be dispensed with for to-day.

Mr. MCRAE. I hope that will not prevail, unless with the usual stipulation that members having reports may be allowed to file them with the Clerk.

Mr. BURNES. There is no objection to that, and I will ask now by unanimous consent that members having reports may file them with the Clerk.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered.

FILING OF REPORTS.

The following reports were filed by being handed in at the Clerk's desk:

NANCY P. BROWN.

Mr. BLISS, from the Committee on Pensions, reported back with amendment the bill (H. R. 10912) granting a pension to Nancy P. Brown; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

LIFE-SAVING SERVICE PENSIONS.

Mr. BLISS also, from the Committee on Pensions, reported back the bill (H. R. 1634) granting pensions in certain cases; which was laid on the table.

He also, from the same committee, reported back, in the nature of a substitute for the foregoing, a bill (H. R. 11281) granting a pension to certain officers and enlisted men of the Life-Saving Service, and to their widows and minor children; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

PENSIONS.

Mr. CHIPMAN, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back favorably the bill (S. 2446) granting an increase of pensions in certain cases therein mentioned; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

RIGHT OF WAY THROUGH HOT SPRINGS RESERVATION, ARKANSAS.

Mr. MCRAE, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported back with amendments the bill (S. 2110) granting the right of way for the construction of a railroad through the Hot Springs reservation, State of Arkansas; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

JOHN A. GRIFFEY.

Mr. SPOONER, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back the Senate amendment to the bill (H. R. 6783) to place the name of John A. Griffey on the pension-roll with the recommendation that it be concurred in; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

B. F. MOODY & CO.

Mr. CROUSE, from the Committee on War Claims, reported back with amendment the bill (H. R. 6569) for the relief of B. F. Moody & Co., or their legal representatives; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

BATTELLE & EVANS.

Mr. CROUSE also, from the Committee on War Claims, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 506) for the relief of Battelle & Evans; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

MOTIER HOWE.

Mr. HERMANN, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 11042) for the relief of Motier Howe; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

Messages, in writing, were received from the President of the United States, by Mr. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries.

The message further announced that the following bill, having been presented to the President on August 10, 1888, and not having been returned by him to the House of Congress in which it originated within the ten days prescribed by the Constitution, had become a law without his approval:

An act (H. R. 7647) to incorporate the Georgetown and Tennallytown Railway Company of the District of Columbia.

The message further announced the approval of bills of the following titles:

An act (H. R. 1331) for the erection of a marine hospital at Evansville, Ind.;

An act (H. R. 3859) for the relief of the Sone and Fleming Manufacturing Company, Limited, of the city of New York;

An act (H. R. 5494) for the relief of John T. Robeson;

An act (H. R. 5222) for the relief of A. M. Anderson and others;

An act (H. R. 6491) for the relief of Lowman & Co.;

An act (H. R. 4659) for the relief of George M. Ochiltree;

An act (H. R. 2611) for the relief of Joseph W. McClurg;

An act (H. R. 2592) for the relief of Andrew Gleeson;

An act (H. R. 8956) for the relief of S. B. West, administrator of Thomas Becton, deceased;

An act (H. R. 3329) to regulate the subdivision of land within the District of Columbia;

An act (H. R. 5863) authorizing the Richmond and Danville Railroad Company to lay tracks, etc., in the District of Columbia; and

An act (H. R. 5156) for the relief of Andrew R. G. Smith.

SOLDIERS AND SAILORS OF THE UNITED STATES, ETC.

Mr. PERKINS, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. 11282) to equalize the payment and do justice to the officers and soldiers and sailors of the United States in the late rebellion who were paid in currency commonly called greenbacks; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

The morning hour was then dispensed with.

DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BURNES. I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering general appropriation bills.

Mr. DIBBLE. I have asked the House to make the special order of the matter of the general deficiency bill for to-morrow at 1 o'clock, stating as a reason therefor that there were a great many members absent, and that the vote would not, if taken, express the real sentiment of the House on the pending question of order. On a careful examination and scrutiny of the record of absentees I find of those who voted for the resolution in December last which instructed the Committee on Appropriations to put the claims approved by the Court of Claims upon the deficiency bill 46 more are absent than of those who voted against it.

Mr. BURNES. I rise simply for the purpose of making a parliamentary inquiry, and that is as to whether the motion I have made is subject to debate?

The SPEAKER. It is not. The Chair supposed the gentleman from South Carolina was going to make a suggestion in reference to the motion.

Mr. DUNN. Regular order.

Mr. BURNES. We have heard the remarks of the gentleman from South Carolina so often heretofore that they have become quite monotonous upon this subject; and I ask the regular order.

Mr. DIBBLE. I was just going to suggest to the gentleman the propriety of postponing the question until to-morrow.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. If this motion is voted down, then we would operate under the morning hour.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour has been dispensed with.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. I mean the hour for the consideration of bills.

The SPEAKER. If that hour should not be antagonized by a revenue bill.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. Then the transaction of business in that hour would proceed as usual if those motions were voted down, as I understand it.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Is there not another hour to be devoted to the consideration of bills?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will cause the rule to be read. Under the rules of the House there is to be one morning hour, technically so denominated, which is the hour for the call of committees for reports. Then the hour follows for the consideration of bills which is provided for by a subsequent rule, or an amendment to the rule. The ninth section of Rule XVI provides as follows, which the Chair will direct the Clerk to read:

The Clerk read as follows:

9. At any time after the expiration of the morning hour it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering bills raising revenue or general appropriation bills.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will see that there are two classes of bills which have preference over the consideration hour, provided a majority of the House determines to consider them: the first, revenue bills, and the second, general appropriation bills. Either of these motions if adopted has priority. If these motions are not made, or if they are made and not agreed to by the House, then the hour for the consideration of bills follows under the other rule of the House.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I raised the question because that rule seems to be in conflict with the language of Rule XXIV, and desired a decision of the Chair upon the question.

The SPEAKER. It does appear so; but the practice has been to harmonize the rules in that way, and allow the two motions to be made giving preference to the consideration of important public bills.

Mr. BUCHANAN. If this motion is voted down, then the rule recurs, and there will be an hour for consideration.

The SPEAKER. There will be.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

The SPEAKER. Pending the motion of the gentleman from Missouri, the Chair desires to lay before the House certain requests for leave of absence.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. HOVEY, of Indiana, asks leave of absence for fifteen days from and after the 30th instant, on account of important business; and

Mr. MATSON asks leave of absence for fifteen days, on account of important business.

[Laughter and applause.]

Mr. BUCHANAN. Inasmuch as the campaign of Indiana has been fought out for some time in this House, I move that it be transplanted to Indiana, and that the leaves of absence asked for be granted. [Laughter.]

Mr. WEAVER. Mr. Speaker, what date is fixed for the leaves of absence?

The SPEAKER. The request is for fifteen days.

Mr. WEAVER. I do not like to object; but I do not see any greater reason for their absence than my own? When is this leave to begin?

The SPEAKER. From the 30th of the present month. Is there objection?

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. I object.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. DIBBLE. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. DIBBLE. Is it in order to move to postpone the consideration of the motion of the gentleman from Missouri until to-morrow at 1 o'clock?

The SPEAKER. It is not. The only way to get rid of the motion is to reject it.

Mr. BAYNE. Is a motion in order to grant the leave of absence, which has just been refused, by unanimous consent to Colonel MATSON and General HOVEY?

The SPEAKER. The request was submitted to the House for unanimous consent but objected to.

Mr. BAYNE. Then I move that it be granted.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I have already made the motion.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New Jersey moves that the request for leave of absence in these cases be granted.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. Would it be in order to amend that, so as to include all other gentlemen who desire to go away for political reasons?

The SPEAKER. It would be in order to submit amendments.

The motion of Mr. BUCHANAN was adopted, and the leaves of absence were granted.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The question now recurs on the motion of the gentleman from Missouri that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union to further consider general appropriation bills.

The question was taken; and on a division there were—ayes 88, noes 4.

Mr. DIBBLE. No quorum.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will appoint tellers.

Mr. DIBBLE and Mr. BURNES were appointed tellers.

Mr. BLAND. We had better have the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken, and decided in the affirmative—yeas 160, nays 4, not voting 160; as follows:

YEAS—160.
